NOTE ON THE DIGITAL COMPANION

关于数字配套网站的说明

来源位置：ix

A website created in conjunction with Experimental Beijing features expanded multimedia materials, including chapter image galleries, documentary videos, curated exhibits, interactive maps, and an archive of artists and images searchable in Chinese and English. Designed to complement and visually deepen the experience of reading the book, the digital platform also provides readers with a nonlinear way to explore the image worlds discussed within. It highlights relationships among images, in which the form and meaning of one is shaped by others, as database searches and curated exhibits open new sight lines and modes of inquiry.

与《实验北京》配套创建的网站收录了扩展的多媒体材料，包括各章图像画廊、纪录影片、策划展览、互动地图，以及可中英文检索的艺术家与图像档案。该数字平台旨在补充并直观深化本书的阅读体验，同时为读者提供一种非线性的方式来探索书中讨论的图像世界。它突显图像之间的关系——其中一幅图像的形式与意义由其他图像塑造——数据库检索与策划展览由此打开新的视线与探究方式。

Throughout the many years it has taken me to research and write this book, the list of people to whom I am indebted has grown in ways I could never have imagined at the outset. The traces of their intellect, imagination, generosity, and care weave through every aspect of what appears in these pages. I am humbled by the collective effort that has sustained this endeavor and more aware than ever that knowledge and creativity are never singular pursuits. I, alone, remain responsible for any errors.

在这项研究和写作延续的许多年里，我受惠于的人名单以我当初无法想象的方式不断增长。他们的才智、想象、慷慨与关怀的痕迹，编织在本书每一页的方方面面。支撑这一事业的集体努力令我谦卑，我也比以往任何时候都更清楚地意识到，知识与创造从来不是单数的追求。书中任何错误由我一人负责。

First and foremost, I thank all of the art world participants—artists, assistants, teachers, students, curators, critics, and gallerists—who shared their lives and work with me, including those whose names and images appear in this book, as well as many others. I appreciate their generosity in time and spirit, often offered before they could know I might be deserving of their trust. Those who responded with criticism and circumspection deepened my thinking and ethical commitments. Beyond those named within the text, I extend thanks to the following individuals. Song Changqing first opened my eyes. Chen Xi, Cui Xiuwen, Daozi, Feng Jiali, Lei Shuang, Tao Yongbai, and Yuan Yaomin guided my early inquiry. Zhang Zhaohui collaborated on interviews and invited me to review exhibits. Zheng Lianjie, Wei Shanghe, and Zha Ba included me as interlocutor in many memorable activities.

首先，我要感谢所有与我分享生活与工作的艺术界参与者——艺术家、助手、教师、学生、策展人、批评家和画廊经营者——包括在本书中出现姓名和形象的人，以及许多其他人。我感激他们在时间和精神上的慷慨，他们往往在尚无法判断我是否值得信任时就已慷慨相助。那些以批评和审慎回应我的人，加深了我的思考与伦理承诺。除正文中已提及的人之外，我还要感谢以下诸位。Song Changqing 最先为我打开眼界。陈曦、崔岫闻、岛子、Feng Jiali、Lei Shuang、陶咏白和 Yuan Yaomin 引导了我最初的探究。张朝晖与我合作访谈，并邀请我撰写展览评论。Zheng Lianjie、Wei Shanghe 和 Zha Ba 在许多难忘的活动中把我当作对话者。

During and since my graduate studies at the University of California, Santa Cruz, Lisa Rofel has mentored me with unfailing dedication, tough love, and profound intellectual vision. I can't thank her enough. I am grateful to all those in the Anthropology, Feminist Studies, History, History of Consciousness, and History of Art and Visual Culture departments who supported my research, especially Gail Hershatter, Anna Tsing, Emily Honig, Donald Brenneis, Nancy Chen, Catherine Soussloff, and Jennifer González. Britta Erickson provided connections that launched my initial fieldwork. Fellow travelers in graduate school and research—Mae Lee, Cynthia Gabriel, Leah Mundell, Shiho Satsuka, Wenqing Kang, Hilde Becker, Alex Day, Hiroyuki Matsubara, Angelina Chin, Xiaoping Sun, Thomas Chang, Ju-chen Chen, Jennifer Choo, Ingrid Dudek, Friederike Fleischer, Mary Ann O'Donnell, and Terry Woronov—provided camaraderie and inspiration. At the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, Professors Luo Hongguang, Tan Shen, Wang Gan, and Weng Naiqun gave insight and encouragement. Zhao Kebin and Pan Jie helped with administrative details that made research possible. At the Central Minorities University, Professor Zhuang Kongshao and Fu Xiaoxing contributed to my appreciation of ethnography as a border-crossing methodology. My family in China—Ying and Colin Chinnery, Liang Wei, and Chen Yonghua—and the deep friendship and warmth of Li Ningning and her family created home away from home.

在加州大学圣克鲁兹分校攻读研究生期间及之后，Lisa Rofel 以始终不渝的投入、严厉的爱和深邃的思想视野指导我。我对她的感谢无以言表。我感谢人类学、女性主义研究、历史学、意识史以及艺术史与视觉文化系所有支持我研究的人，尤其是 Gail Hershatter、Anna Tsing、Emily Honig、Donald Brenneis、Nancy Chen、Catherine Soussloff 和 Jennifer González。Britta Erickson 提供了启动我最初田野工作的那些人脉。研究生和研究生涯中的同行——Mae Lee、Cynthia Gabriel、Leah Mundell、Shiho Satsuka、Wenqing Kang、Hilde Becker、Alex Day、Hiroyuki Matsubara、Angelina Chin、Xiaoping Sun、Thomas Chang、Ju-chen Chen、Jennifer Choo、Ingrid Dudek、Friederike Fleischer、Mary Ann O'Donnell 和 Terry Woronov——给了我情谊与灵感。在中国社会科学院，Luo Hongguang 教授、Tan Shen 教授、Wang Gan 教授和 Weng Naiqun 教授给了我洞见与鼓励。Zhao Kebin 和 Pan Jie 帮助处理行政细节，使研究得以进行。在中央民族大学，Zhuang Kongshao 教授和 Fu Xiaoxing 帮助我理解民族志作为一种跨越边界的方法论。我在中国的家人——Ying 和 Colin Chinnery、Liang Wei 以及 Chen Yonghua——还有 Li Ningning 及其家人的深厚友谊与温暖，为我营造了异乡的家。

At the University of Washington, I received support from many colleagues. Sareeta Amrute, Rachel Chapman, and Danny Hoffman in Anthropology read chapters. Madeleine Yue Dong in China Studies provided opportunities early on to make connections between UW and the Seattle Art Museum. Juliet McMains and Christina Sunardi, ethnographers of dance and music, gave thoughtful counsel. I held a joint appointment in Anthropology and Gender, Women and Sexuality Studies for many years, during which my dean and several chairs—Judith Howard, Priti Ramamurthy, David Allen, Janelle Taylor, Alison Wylie, and Miriam Kahn—helped me navigate and strengthen the interdisciplinary nature of my research and teaching. To the entire faculty and staff of my home department, Gender, Women and Sexuality Studies, I extend gratitude for their wisdom and daily sustenance in feminist thought and movement: Michelle Habell-Pallán, Angela Ginorio, Nancy Kenny, Regina Yung Lee, Priti Ramamurthy, Chandan Reddy, Luana Ross, Amanda Lock Swarr, Shirley Yee, Catherine Richardson, Young Kim, as well as Tani Barlow, Carol Langdon, and Elaine Haig-Widner. I have worked with and learned from remarkable graduate advisees—Darren Byler, alma khasawnih, Nicole Robert, Hope St. John, Yiyu Tian, and Shuxuan Zhou. alma, Nicole, Hope, Yiyu, and Shuxuan, as well as Zhihua Li and Can Zhao, provided research assistance. Many other students, staff, and faculty at UW contributed to the digital companion to this book; I acknowledge them on the credits page of the website. At every stage, the Simpson Center for the Humanities provided exceptional scholarly support under the visionary leadership of Kathleen Woodward. Assistance from Simpson Center staff, especially Miriam Bartha, proved vital to this project and others that informed it, including the Visual Praxis Collective coordinated with Danny Hoffman; New Geographies of Feminist Art: China, Asia, and the World, an international conference co-organized with Sonal Khullar, with joint funding from an American Council of Learned Societies Comparative Perspectives on Chinese Culture and Society Grant; and Ethnographic Aesthetics: Word, Image, Sound, a speaker series and microseminar. All of the New Geographies participants, especially Sonal and our keynote speaker Shu-mei Shih, impacted the final version of this book. Renato Rosaldo, who first opened the door to anthropology for me as an undergraduate, opened Ethnographic Aesthetics with poetry and conversation that renewed my passion and hope for ethnography. Last but by no means least, the smart, brave, and fierce sisters of Women Investigating Race, Ethnicity, and Difference (wired) have kept me moving forward in all possible ways.

在华盛顿大学，我得到了许多同事的支持。人类学系的 Sareeta Amrute、Rachel Chapman 和 Danny Hoffman 阅读了部分章节。中国研究项目的 Madeleine Yue Dong 在早期为我提供了把华盛顿大学与西雅图艺术博物馆联系起来的各种机会。舞蹈与音乐民族志学者 Juliet McMains 和 Christina Sunardi 给了我有益的建议。我多年来在人类学系与性别、女性及性研究系担任联合聘任，在此期间，我的院长和几位系主任——Judith Howard、Priti Ramamurthy、David Allen、Janelle Taylor、Alison Wylie 和 Miriam Kahn——帮助我把握并加强我的研究与教学的跨学科性质。我感谢我所在系全体教师和员工在女性主义思想与运动方面给予的智慧与日常滋养：Michelle Habell-Pallán、Angela Ginorio、Nancy Kenny、Regina Yung Lee、Priti Ramamurthy、Chandan Reddy、Luana Ross、Amanda Lock Swarr、Shirley Yee、Catherine Richardson、Young Kim，以及 Tani Barlow、Carol Langdon 和 Elaine Haig-Widner。我曾与一些出色的研究生合作并从中学习——Darren Byler、alma khasawnih、Nicole Robert、Hope St. John、Yiyu Tian 和 Shuxuan Zhou。alma、Nicole、Hope、Yiyu 和 Shuxuan，以及 Zhihua Li 和 Can Zhao，提供了研究协助。华盛顿大学的许多其他学生、员工和教师为本书的数字配套网站作出了贡献；我在网站鸣谢页上一一致谢。辛普森人文中心在 Kathleen Woodward 富有远见的领导下，在每个阶段都提供了卓越的学术支持。辛普森中心员工，尤其是 Miriam Bartha 的协助，对本项目以及与之相关的其他项目至关重要，包括与 Danny Hoffman 协作的视觉实践集体；“女性主义艺术的新地理：中国、亚洲与世界”，这是与 Sonal Khullar 共同组织的一次国际会

议，获得美国学术团体理事会“中国文化与社会比较视角”资助；“民族志美学：文字、图像、声音”，这是一个系列讲座与微型研讨会。所有“新地理”参与者，尤其是 Sonal 和我们的主题演讲人史书美，影响了本书的最终版本。Renato Rosaldo 在我本科时首次为我打开人类学之门，他又以诗歌与交谈为“民族志美学”揭幕，重新点燃了我对民族志的热情与希望。最后但绝非最不重要的，是“调查种族、族裔与差异的女性”（WIRED）那些聪明、勇敢而炽热的姐妹们，她们以一切可能的方式让我不断前行。

This book grew out of dissertation research supported by grants from the Wenner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research, University of California Office of the President Pacific Rim Research Project, and American Association of University Women. At the University of Washington, the Simpson Center Society of Scholars and Royalty Research Fund provided resources, most essentially time, for research and writing. I also gratefully acknowledge the East Asia Center and China Studies Program for research and travel support. Subvention funds from China Studies and the Simpson Center helped increase the number and quality of images in the book.

Funding from the China and Inner Asia Council of the Association for Asian Studies and the Asian Cultural Council made possible the Cruel/Loving Bodies exhibit in Shanghai, Beijing, and Hong Kong that evolved out of my fieldwork. The artists and curators involved—He Chengyao, Bai Chongmin and Wu Weihe, Anthony Leung Po Shan, Rosanna Wei Han Li, Zheng Bo, Neil Conroy and Lesley Sanderson, susan pui san lok, Mayling To, Biljana Ciric, Stella Win Yan Fong, and Zoe Ming Wai Shek—taught me an enormous amount about the conceptual and practical challenges of art.

Ken Wissoker at Duke University Press has been an important and patient advocate of the book from beginning to end. Elizabeth Ault oversaw the publication process with incredible organization and grace. Several anonymous readers gave perceptive and bracing feedback that strengthened the manuscript. Tim Stallmann designed the wonderful maps. Wendy Call, writing guru par excellence, read almost every word, and without fail tightened my prose and coaxed me off ladders of abstraction back into the realm of lived experience. John Vallier, Matthew Allen, and Zhijia Shen of the University of Washington Libraries assisted with image preparation and permissions. I am extremely grateful to the institutions, artists, and photographers who gave permission to reproduce images essential to the book's story and argument.

Nothing would be possible without a lifetime of love and support from my parents and larger, extended family. James Tweedie has been with me through every twist and turn of this project, serving as a constant source of devotion, compassion, humor, and brilliance. I can't imagine life without him. Our children Lino and Zola teach us on a daily basis about why we do what we do and how to do it better. They have been infinitely patient with failed attempts to grant me with the superpower to write a book in ten minutes instead of ten years. And they reminded me at the very end that I still needed to thank the world and feminists! May their wisdom guide me through everything yet to come.

He was born in 1895, son to a farmer turned self-taught artist. He and his father scraped by as itinerant portrait painters. He was seventeen when his father arranged his marriage, although his wife fell ill and died young. After his father died, he made his way to Shanghai, where he studied painting and dreamed of Paris. He found a patron, a Jew from Baghdad married to a wealthy Shanghai real estate magnate. In 1917, she sent him to study in Japan. In 1919, he shipped off to Paris with a new wife who had run away from an arranged marriage. He attended the École des Beaux-Arts and copied Prud'hon, Delacroix, Velázquez, Rembrandt. When his scholarship money ran low, his wife supported his study of the great European masters by sewing piecework embroidery for the Magasins du Louvre. He returned to China as a celebrated salon painter with bohemian hair, velvet coat, and cravat tied in a bow at his neck. His paintings blended traditional Chinese brush technique with the figurative realism of his European training.[1]

She was born in 1895, orphaned at a young age, and sent to live with her uncle. He sold her as a teenager into a brothel, where she gained the sympathies of a wealthy customs official. He already had a wife from an arranged marriage, so she became his concubine. He gave her a heart locket with their photos in it, which she wore around her neck. Recognizing her talent, he sent her to art school in Shanghai. In 1919, she won a government scholarship to study abroad. During an eight-year sojourn in Europe, she studied in Lyon, Paris, and Rome. She returned to China and exhibited eighty works in her first solo exhibition, which drew crowds in Ningbo. The First National Art Exhibition of 1929 in Shanghai included five of her paintings in oil and gouache. While she received acclaim for her realist depiction, her brushwork and use of color showed the influence of modernists like Cézanne and Matisse.[2]

她生于 1895 年，幼年成为孤儿，被送到叔叔家生活。十几岁时，叔叔把她卖进妓院，她在那里得到一位富有海关官员的同情。这位官员已有包办婚姻的妻子，于是她成了他的妾。他送她一个心形吊坠，里面放着两人的照片，她一直戴在脖子上。他看出她的才华，送她去上海的美术学校。1919 年，她获得政府奖学金出国留学。在欧洲的八年里，她在里昂、巴黎和罗马学习。回国后，她举办了首次个展，展出八十件作品，在宁波引起轰动。1929 年上海第一届全国美术展览会收录了她的五幅油画和水粉画。她的写实描绘赢得赞誉，而她的笔触和色彩运用则显示出塞尚、马蒂斯等现代主义者的影响。[2]

Xu Beihong became head of painting at the newly established National Central University in Nanjing and hired Pan Yuliang to teach under his direction. In a photograph of the faculty, they stand side by side on a campus lawn: she with her Western suit and strapped heels, a book clutched in her arm; he with his parted hair and floppy cravat, a dark coat and hat clutched in his arm. Former École des Beaux-Arts classmates, they shared an academic training in oil painting. Xu held fast to this tradition while Pan pushed its boundaries in explorations of female subjectivity. In an incendiary review of the 1929 National Art Exhibition, Xu championed academic realism against the “despicable, muddle-headed, dark and corrupted elements” of modernism.[3]

徐悲鸿成为南京新成立的国立中央大学绘画系主任，并聘请潘玉良在他的指导下任教。在一张教师合影中，两人并肩站在校园草坪上：她身穿西式套装和系带高跟鞋，臂弯里夹着一本书；他梳着分头，系着松垮的领巾，臂弯里夹着深色外套和帽子。他们曾是巴黎国立高等美术学院的同学，都受过油画学院训练。徐悲鸿坚守这一传统，而潘玉良则在探索女性主体性时拓展其边界。在 1929 年全国美展一篇措辞激烈的评论中，徐悲鸿捍卫学院写实主义，反对现代主义那些“卑鄙、糊涂、黑暗、腐败的元素”。[3]

The Art Movement Society, founded by other overseas students returned from France, responded to this call to arms with a manifesto. It declared, “Artists should not confine their views within national boundaries, nor should different schools attempt to turn competition into a domestic conflict! It is our belief, therefore, that artists of this new era should study the art of all nations with a global perspective. Any art, not limited to the art of Europe, but extending to the art of the Philippines and Australia, deserves our attention as long as we can learn from it.”[4]

由其他留法归国学生创立的艺术运动社发表宣言，回应这一战斗号召。宣言宣称：“ 艺术家的视野不应囿于国界，不同流派也不应把竞争变成国内冲突！因此我们相信，新时代的艺术家应以全球视野研究各国艺术。任何艺术，不限于欧洲艺术，凡可学习者，即便远及菲律宾和澳大利亚，也值得我们关注。”[4]

In the years to follow, the clash between Nationalists and Communists reached a violent crescendo that engulfed the politics of aesthetic conflict. Left-wing members of organizations like the Morning Flower Society—whose woodcut movement drew on German Expressionism, Soviet engraving, and Japanese printmaking—were shot dead.[5] Morality campaigns meant to enforce social order attacked the behavior of modern girls like the painter of sensuous nudes, with her cropped hair and strapped heels. While no extant evidence supports the story of Pan Yuliang’s domestic downfall, it circulates in the popular imagination: that someone defaced a painting of a male nude in her last exhibit in China and left a note describing the work as “praise from a prostitute to a brothel frequenter.”[6] She turned her back on these critics for a studio on rue Vercingétorix in Paris, where she lived the remaining decades of her life.

此后数年间，国共冲突达到暴力的高潮，将审美冲突的政治也卷入其中。朝花社一类组织中的左翼成员遭到枪杀——该社的木刻运动吸收德国表现主义、苏联版画和日本版画。[5] 旨在维护社会秩序的道德运动，攻击剪短发、穿系带高跟鞋、画富有感官美的裸体人物的现代女性。虽然现存证据并不支持潘玉良在国内身败名裂的故事，它却在公众想象中流传：在她在中国的最后一次展览上，有人污损了一幅男体裸画，并留下字条称该作品是“ 妓女对嫖客的赞美 ”。[6] 她转身离开这些批评者，前往巴黎韦尔辛热托里克斯街的一间画室，在那里度过余生。

Xu Beihong rode the storm and emerged a national artist and patriot. He held exhibits and sold paintings throughout South and Southeast Asia to raise funds for Chinese war relief. In Darjeeling, he sketched the Indian models whose figures fill his large-scale ink painting of the Chinese parable about a foolish old man intent on moving the mountain blocking his view. He was named the first president of Beijing’s Central Academy of Fine Art and stood on the rostrum with Mao Zedong when he announced the birth of the People’s Republic of China.

徐悲鸿历经风暴，成为民族艺术家和爱国者。他在南亚和东南亚各地举办展览、卖画，为中国战时救济筹款。在大吉岭，他为印度模特画速写，这些人物后来填满了他的巨幅水墨画——画的是一位愚公决意搬走挡住自己视线的大山的中国寓言。他被任命为北京中央美术学院首任院长，并在毛泽东宣告中华人民共和国成立时，与他同站在主席台上。

These are well-known, worldly fables, honed from the remains of history, of artistic recognition and rejection. They refute the fable of a China closed to the world until the post-Mao era of economic reform and linking tracks with transnational capitalism. And they haunted the neighborhood where I lived from 2000 to 2002 during my fieldwork on Chinese contemporary art worlds.

这些都是众所周知的世俗寓言，从历史的残余中锤炼而成，讲述艺术上的承认与拒绝。它们驳斥了那种认为中国在毛泽东之后的经济改革和与跨国资本主义接轨之前一直闭关自守的寓言。它们也萦绕在我 2000 年至 2002 年做中国当代艺术界田野调查时居住的街区。

It was a short walk from my Xinjiekou apartment in Xicheng District to the Xu Beihong Memorial Hall, opened in 1983 after the original museum in the artist's house was demolished for subway construction. A hush enveloped the gated museum, a grey compound of stone and concrete set back from a street bustling with commerce. A bronze statue of Xu, palette and brushes in hand, presided in front. In a glass-encased re-creation of his studio, a pair of vertical large-character scrolls hung on the wall. This poetic couplet in the artist's calligraphy echoed the words of Lu Xun, made famous by Mao in his pronouncements on art and society: "Fierce-browed, I coolly defy a thousand pointing fingers, / Head bowed, like a willing ox I serve the children."

从西城区新街口公寓到徐悲鸿纪念馆只需步行片刻。纪念馆原址是徐悲鸿故居，因修建地铁被拆除，1983 年在新址开放。灰色石与混凝土的院落从繁华商业街后退，铁门之内一片寂静。门前矗立着手持调色板和画笔的徐悲鸿铜像。在一个玻璃罩着的画室复原场景里，墙上挂着一副大字立轴对联。这副由艺术家亲笔书写的诗句，呼应鲁迅的话——毛泽东在论述艺术与社会时使之广为人知：" 横眉冷对千夫指，俯首甘为孺子牛。"

In the dvd shop across the street overflowing with shelves and boxes of indiscriminately mixed films from China and around the world, I bought a copy of Hua hun (A soul haunted by painting), the biopic of Pan Yuliang that brought her back from a grave in Montparnasse to the public consciousness of her home country.[7] When an exhibit of her work appeared at the nearby Cultural Palace of Minorities in 2002, it was a small and short-lived affair. The show featured the decorative ink paintings of dancing figures she had produced toward the end of her life. A nod to Orientalism, a survival tactic, or perhaps a nostalgic nod to her distant youth. Notably absent were the fierce-browed self-portraits in deft, bold strokes of oil she had painted of herself staring confrontationally at the pointing fingers that had driven her to a small room in Paris.

街对面是一家 DVD 店，货架和箱子里塞满了来自中国和世界各地、混杂无序的电影。我在那里买了一张《画魂》——潘玉良的传记片，这部电影把她从蒙帕纳斯的坟墓带回祖国的公众意识。[7] 2002 年，她的作品展在附近民族文化宫举行，规模不大，时间也短。展览展出的是她晚年创作的装饰性舞蹈人物水墨画。那或许是对东方主义的致意，一种生存策略，或是对遥远青春的怀旧回望。引人注意的是，那些用大胆利落的油彩笔触画成的、眉头紧锁的自画像缺席了；画中她正视着那些曾把她逼到巴黎一间小屋里的指指点点。

Several months after moving to Xinjiekou, I finally walked past the statue of Xu Beihong into his memorial hall. There I met a man whose job was to explain old paintings and photographs to the few visitors who made their way to the dusty museum. He guided me under the florescent lighting of the exhibit halls and described how a hawk crouched to push off in flight represented the Chinese determined to fight Japanese invaders, how toiling workers moving a mountain represented the heroic feat of socialist revolution. He asked where I was from, what I did, and how I'd learned to speak Chinese. He pondered the discovery of my mixed-blood Chinese American background, the fact that my grandparents had left China, never to return, before the war and revolution. We exchanged business cards, and three days later, he called. He told me he found it interesting that as an anthropologist my job was to talk to people about their lives. He asked me to come back. He felt he had something to tell me.

搬进新街口几个月后，我终于走过徐悲鸿铜像，走进他的纪念馆。在那里，我遇到一个男人，他的工作是向少数来到这座蒙尘博物馆的参观者讲解旧画和旧照片。他带我在展厅的荧光灯下参观，讲述一只俯身准备起飞的鹰如何代表决心抗击日本侵略者的中国人，辛勤劳作、搬动大山的工人如何代表社会主义革命的英雄壮举。他问我是哪里人、做什么工作、怎么学会说中文。他思索着我这个中美混血儿的身份——我的祖父母在战争和革命之前离开中国，再也没有回来。我们交换了名片，三天后，他打来电话。他说，他觉得很有趣：作为人类学家，我的工作就是和人谈他们的生活。他让我回去，说他觉得有话要对我说。

He sat me down in the lobby of the museum and launched into a discussion of political censorship of art in China. Would this happen in the United States? In a swerve that caught me off balance, he raised a rhetorical question about the high rate of divorce in the United States. He told me this was right. I'd be a fool to believe someone would love me for my whole life. Then he asked me if I felt more Chinese or more American.

他让我在博物馆大厅坐下，开始谈中国的艺术政治审查。这种事会在美国发生吗？接着他话锋一转，令我措手不及，提出一个反问：美国的离婚率很高吧？他说这很对。我要是相信有人会爱我一辈子，那就是傻瓜。然后他问我，觉得自己更像中国人还是更像美国人。

"Do you feel discriminated against, for being Chinese there or foreign here?" Not waiting for my response, he declared loudly, spittle flying, "I have always been discriminated against."

" 你有没有觉得受歧视——在美国因为你是中国人，在这里因为你是外国人？" 没等我回答，他就大声宣称，唾沫横飞：" 我一直受歧视。"

My parents were both high-ranking cadres in an army unit. When I was young, I learned to drive and to shoot, but then my parents were denounced, and my brother and I became black elements. Everyone spat upon us, and we wandered the streets with nowhere to call home. I could sing then. I could have been a “beautiful voice,” but I chose boxing instead. I wanted to fight to defend myself from attackers. My mother lived in a pigsty for ten years while I learned to knock people down. After my parents were rehabilitated, I became a bodyguard. I could run fast, and I already knew how to drive and handle guns. I worked for gangsters, but you wouldn’t believe what I’ve seen if I told you. I worked for the government, but I can’t tell you whom I’ve protected. My initial assignment in the Cultural Bureau was to be the driver for this artist’s widow.

我父母都是一个军队单位的高级干部。小时候我学会了开车和射击，可后来父母被批斗，我和兄弟成了黑五类。人人都朝我们吐唾沫，我们在街上流浪，无处安身。那时我会唱歌。我本可以成为一把“好嗓子”，但我选择了拳击。我要打回去，保护自己不受攻击。我母亲在猪圈里住了十年，而我学会了把人打倒。父母平反后，我当了保镖。我跑得快，而且已经会开车、会用枪。我给黑帮干过，我要是告诉你我见过什么，你不会相信。我给政府干过，但我不能告诉你我保护过谁。我被分配到文化局的第一项任务，是给这位艺术家的遗孀当司机。

I shook my head. “I am a crouching tiger, hidden dragon.” As I walked home to my apartment, rented from a woman named Art Soldier, the daughter of retired Cultural Bureau workers, herself recently divorced and remarried, who had moved on from her work-unit housing to the domestic fantasy of a new commodity apartment, I kept looking over my shoulder.

我摇摇头。“我是卧虎藏龙。”我走回租住的公寓，一路不断回头张望。公寓的房东是一位名叫“文艺兵”的女人，退休文化局干部的女儿，最近刚离了婚又再婚。她离开了单位宿舍，搬进一套新商品房，去实现家庭生活的梦想。

Introduction: Chinese Contemporary Art in the Expanded Field

导论　扩展场域中的中国当代艺术

来源位置：7

At the beginning of the 1990s, no named Chinese artist had ever participated in the Venice Biennale, one of the most prestigious and longest-running international art shows in the world.[1] In 1999, twenty Chinese artists—the most from any single country—showed more than fifty visual artworks at the Forty-Eighth Biennale.[2] This historic shift reflected the post-1989 circulation of contemporary art from China in Hong Kong, Japan, Europe, and the United States, as well as the erratic but gradual loosening of political control of art in China. By the early 2000s, Chinese cities such as Beijing, Chengdu, Guangzhou, and Shanghai had adopted the "biennale" model, seen as a marker of cultural cosmopolitanism, and began launching large contemporary art exhibits of their own. During this period of change, an almost uniformly male cohort of artists, noted for their bad boy political dissent, garnered attention on the international museum circuit and art market. Overseas observers heralded their work as representative of reform-era China. Their female counterparts, many of whom had trained alongside them in state-supported art academies, remained in the long shadow cast by this international spotlight on a masculinist avant-garde.

20 世纪 90 年代初，还没有任何一位具名的中国艺术家参加过威尼斯双年展——这是世界上历史最悠久、最具声望的国际艺术展之一。[1] 1999 年，二十位中国艺术家——来自单一国家的人数最多——在第四十八届威尼斯双年展上展出了五十多件视觉艺术作品。[2] 这一历史性转变，反映了 1989 年之后中国当代艺术在香港、日本、欧洲和美国的流通，也反映了中国对艺术的政治控制虽有起伏却逐步松动。到 21 世纪初，北京、成都、广州和上海等中国城市已采用“双年展”模式——它被视为文化世界主义的标志——并开始举办自己的大型当代艺术展。在这一变革时期，一批几乎清一色为男性的艺术家以其“坏男孩”式的政治异见闻名，在国际博物馆巡展体系和艺术市场上获得关注。海外观察者称赞他们的作品代表了改革时代的中国。而他们的女性同行——其中许多人曾在国家支持的美术院校与他们一同受训——仍留在国际聚光灯投向男性主义前卫艺术所投下的长长阴影之中。

Several contending narratives framed this explosion of Chinese contemporary art on the international stage. Exhibition in the West rescued and recuperated Chinese artists suppressed by an authoritarian government. Or, this phenomenon represented a radical reversal of socialist China's art system and new opening to "the world." Or, it demonstrated China's national triumph on the global cultural scene. Indeed, by 2005, China had its own national pavilion at the Venice Biennale.[3] By 2011, when India organized its first pavilion, anxiety crept into Western reportage. The Guardian's coverage of this moment leads with a vaguely accusatory tone: "Not content with their status as nascent economic superpowers, China and India are set to storm a very European cultural bastion, the Venice Biennale."[4]

关于中国当代艺术在国际舞台上的爆发，有几种相互竞争的说法。一种认为，在西方展出拯救了被威权政府压制的中国艺术家，使他们重新获得认可。另一种认为，这一现象代表了对社会主义中国艺术体系的彻底逆转，以及对“世界”的新开放。还有一种认为，它展示了中国在全球文化舞台上的民族胜利。的确，到 2005 年，中国在威尼斯双年展上有了自己的国家馆。[3] 到 2011 年印度首次组织国家馆时，焦虑渗入了西方报道。《卫报》对这一时刻的报道开篇便带着一种隐隐的指责口吻：“中国和印度不满足于新兴经济超级大国的地位，正准备冲击一个非常欧洲的文化堡垒——威尼斯双年展。”[4]

Ai Weiwei, the most globally recognized artist to emerge from this period, gained such stature because he crosscut and emblematized these narrative logics. He left China in 1981 and returned over a decade later with New York art world credibility. In 2000, he cocurated Fuck Off, a satellite exhibit, shut down by authorities, to the first international Shanghai Biennale. By 2003 he was official consultant to the Swiss architecture firm Herzog and de Meuron on their design for the Beijing Olympics National "Bird's Nest" stadium. He then flipped the state off—through public art projects critical of official hypocrisy and maleficence—with such flagrant style that he landed in jail.[5] He became the ultimate in bad boy political dissent, enabling the West to still feel edgy and free as exhibits like his 2014 @Large: Ai Weiwei on Alcatraz stormed a decommissioned outpost of the U.S. prison industrial complex, rejuvenating the worn tourist attraction. Sometimes it seemed he was all that was left standing after the boom.

艾未未是这一时期涌现的最具全球知名度的艺术家，他之所以获得如此地位，是因为他横跨并象征了这些叙事逻辑。他 1981 年离开中国，十多年后带着纽约艺术界的资历归来。2000 年，他与他人共同策划了首次国际化的上海双年展的外围展“不合作方式”（Fuck Off），该展被当局关闭。到 2003 年，他成为瑞士建筑事务所赫尔佐格和德梅隆设计北京奥运会国家“鸟巢”体育场的官方顾问。随后，他以极为张扬的风格向国家竖起了中指——通过批判官方虚伪与恶行的公共艺术项目——最终身陷囹圄。[5] 他成为“坏男孩”政治异见的终极化身，使西方仍能自感前卫而自由，例如他 2014 年的展览“@Large：艾未未在阿尔卡特拉斯”闯入美国监狱工业复合体一处退役的前哨，让这个陈旧的旅游景点重获生机。有时看来，热潮过后，他是唯一还站立着的人。

Experimental Beijing challenges conventional narratives of rescue, reversal, or arrival through an ethnographic account of art world transition grounded in everyday experience and struggle rather than landmark exhibits and events. It examines the social role of art and competing ideas of aesthetic, cultural, and market value in reform-era China. And it does so with a feminist attentiveness to power dynamics in the work of art under the cultural conditions of late socialism–late liberalism that characterized China's shifting position in the world.

《实验北京》挑战这些关于拯救、逆转或抵达的常规叙事。本书以日常经验与挣扎而非标志性展览和事件为基础，对艺术界的转型做民族志考察。它审视改革时代中国的艺术的社会角色，以及关于审美、文化和市场价值的相互竞争的观念。本书还带着女性主义对艺术劳动中权力动态的关注，将其置于晚期社会主义—晚期自由主义的文化条件中，正是这些条件塑造了中国在世界上不断变化的位置。

The conjunction of late socialism-late liberalism signals the interrelation of these two social projects from the 1980s on.[6] Under the leadership of Deng Xiaoping (1978–1989), the Chinese Communist Party (ccp) advanced the ideology of "Socialism with Chinese Characteristics," which espoused market economics not as an abandonment of Marxism but as a commitment to the primary stage of socialism necessary for the future potentiality of communism. This reform of Maoist politics rejected the former utopian belief that modernization of productive forces through the market could be bypassed. With the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 and the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991, the ccp legitimated its rule through new forms of governmentality and integration with neoliberalism as it unfolded in other parts of the world. State-owned enterprises were dismantled and sold off, and new public-private coalitions increasingly managed the provision of social services from housing to health care. Official institutions disseminated a wide-ranging discourse on suzhi (quality) in which market success came to serve as the measure of individual and social value. Overall economic growth brought with it mounting material disparity and dispossession, as well as the suppression of protest in the name of social stability and the road to communism. Chinese neoliberalism provincialized the Western belief in market capitalism as linked with liberal democracy. The resulting crisis in legitimacy contributed to late liberalism, in which nations understood as liberal democracies justified their unequal distribution of livelihood through the invocation of cultural difference and need for civilizational securitization, in the name of future freedom for all. Experimental Beijing documents this historical, experimental era in China, in which cultural production came to matter as a means of integration, legitimation, differentiation, and contestation. Some of the aesthetic experiments this moment gave rise to have become monumental, others ephemeral.

晚期社会主义与晚期自由主义的连接，标志着这两个社会工程自 20 世纪 80 年代以来的相互关联。[6] 在邓小平（1978—1989）领导下，中国共产党提出“中国特色社会主义”意识形态，主张市场经济并非放弃马克思主义，而是对社会主义初级阶段的承诺，这个阶段是未来共产主义可能性所必需的。这场对毛泽东主义政治的改革，否定了先前那种认为可以绕过经由市场实现生产力现代化这一过程的乌托邦信念。随着 1989 年柏林墙倒塌和 1991 年苏联解体，中共通过新的治理形式，以及与世界其他地区展开的新自由主义相整合，为其统治取得合法性。国有企业被拆解、出售，新的公私联盟日益掌管从住房到医疗的社会服务供给。官方机构传播关于“素质”（suzhi）的广泛话语，市场成功由此成为衡量个人与社会价值的尺度。总体经济增长带来了日益加剧的物质不平等和剥夺，也带来了以社会稳定和通往共产主义之路为名的抗议压制。中国的新自由主义将西方关

于市场资本主义与自由民主相联系的信念地方化了。由此产生的合法性危机助长了晚期自由主义：被理解为自由民主的国家通过援引文化差异和文明安全化的需要，以未来人人自由为名，为其不平等的生计分配辩护。《实验北京》记录了中国的这一历史的、实验性的时代——文化生产在其中成为整合、合法化、区分和抗争的手段。这一时刻所催生的审美实验，有些已成为纪念碑，另一些则转瞬即逝。

The global rise of Chinese contemporary art coincided with official efforts to stage spectacular international events, such as the Beijing Olympics in 2008 and the Shanghai World Expo in 2010, to attract the world's attention and signal the end of a colonial first-world, third-world order of things. While often understood as distinct, mutually antagonistic realms of social activity, contemporary art and Chinese state politics increasingly overlapped. After the 1989 crackdown on protests in Tiananmen Square, a censorious attitude had characterized official response to contemporary art. During the lead-up to the Olympics, this circumspection gave way to a new market-driven, culture industry valuation of art. Experimental artists who felt the brunt of Cultural Bureau control throughout the 1990s, when Public Security officials routinely shut down "avant-garde" exhibits, suddenly found themselves courted to advance China's image on the global stage.[7] Exhibition spaces generating new middle-class distinction eclipsed state-controlled museums whose dictate had been to exhibit the art of proletarian revolutionary nationalism. State planners, frequently operating in the changing economy as semicorporate entities, began to invite artists once lauded by foreign promoters as dissident visionaries to run new museums, create work for Beijing's new airport, and design Olympic monuments, firework displays, and ceremony spectacles. The early years of the twenty-first century served as a turning point for Chinese contemporary art and a moment of continual reassessment and reflection by artists caught up in the processes of cultural marketization driven by intersecting local, national, and global forces.

中国当代艺术的全球崛起，恰逢官方努力举办壮观国际盛事——如 2008 年北京奥运会和 2010 年上海世博会——以吸引世界目光，宣告殖民式的第一世界/第三世界秩序终结。当代艺术与中国国家政治虽常被理解为彼此分离、相互对抗的社会活动领域，却日益交叠。1989 年天安门广场抗议遭到镇压后，官方对当代艺术的回应一度以审查态度为特征。在奥运会筹备期间，这种谨慎让位于一种市场驱动、文化产业式的艺术估值。整个 20 世纪 90 年代，公安局官员经常关闭“前卫”展览，实验艺术家深受文化局控制之害；而此时，他们突然被拉拢来推进中国在全球舞台上的形象。[7] 生产新中产阶级区隔的展览空间，盖过了受国家控制、以展出无产阶级革命民族主义艺术为指令的博物馆。国家规划者在变化的经济中往往以半企业实体的方式运作，开始邀请曾被外国推广者誉为异见先知的艺术家来经营新博物馆、为北京新机场创作、设计奥运纪念碑、烟火和仪式景观。21 世纪初成为中国当代艺术的一个转折点，也是艺术家不断重新评估和反思的时刻——他们陷于由地方、国家与全球力量交汇驱动的文化市场化进程之中。

Their activity, centered in China's rapidly transforming "global cities," occurred in tandem with revaluations of rural and urban space, public and private boundaries, and masculinity and femininity.[8] Through participant observation from 2000 to 2002, predominantly in Beijing, I came to understand Chinese contemporary art not as a bounded object but a zone of cultural encounter in which these revaluations were represented, worked out, and questioned. Its participants included artists, officials, urban planners, cultural consultants, and art professionals from around the world who, in repeated encounters in China and abroad, negotiated what counts as Chinese and what counts as art. In debates about women and art, they negotiated what counts as feminist. While the frame of encounter ostensibly characterizes this early twenty-first-century moment, how artists navigated shifting flows of art discourse also reveals historical encounters and contradictions in understandings of what art is meant to do. As I detail in the three parts of this book—Art Worldings, Zones of Encounter, and Feminist Sight Lines—artists adapted to the changing ideological context for art production but not without a struggle over the politics of form and how it positioned them in relation to the nation and the world, the past and the future.

他们的活动以中国迅速转型的“全球城市”为中心，与对城乡空间、公私边界以及男性气质和女性气质的重新估价同步发生。[8] 2000 年至 2002 年，我主要在北京进行参与观察，逐渐认识到中国当代艺术不是一个有边界的对象，而是一个文化相遇地带（zone of encounter）。这些重新估价在其中被再现、协商和质疑。其参与者包括艺术家、官员、城市规划者、文化顾问以及来自世界各地的艺术专业人士；他们在中国和国外的反复相遇中，协商什么算中国的、什么算艺术。在关于女性与艺术的争论中，他们协商什么算女性主义的。相遇的框架表面上描述了 21 世纪初这一时刻，但艺术家如何穿行于艺术话语的流动变化，也揭示了历史性的相遇，以及关于艺术应做什么的理解中的矛盾。正如我在本书三个部分——艺术世界营造、相遇地带、女性主义视线——中详述的，艺术家适应了艺术生产不断变化的意识形态语境，但这一过程伴随着围绕形式政治及形式如何将他们置于民族与世界、过去与未来关系中的斗争。

Wang Nengtao's 2002 panoramic photograph Subversion–Earth captures the scale of construction that permeated Beijing, as well as other Chinese megacities, at the turn of the millennium (plate 1).[9] Massive yellow cranes punctuate the scene. They jut into the sky and recede in grey tones toward a smoggy horizon. In the expanse of worksites below, demarcated by green mesh fencing, sandbag walls, and piles of rebar, workers in yellow helmets appear miniature. The piece's long horizontal format resembles a traditional Chinese scroll painting, but rather than inviting the viewer's eye to meander through a natural landscape, with resting spots along the way for reflection, its perspectival, photographic realism insists on a survey from above, of an anonymous multitude turning over the earth in an ideological remaking—a re-worlding—of Chinese social life.[10] Wang's title hints at how such monumental efforts destabilized past political projects, of Communist Party class revolution and agrarian reform, as well as everyday existence in a city like Beijing.

王能涛 2002 年的全景摄影《颠覆——土地》捕捉了世纪之交弥漫北京的建造规模，也捕捉了中国其他特大城市的景象（图版 1）。[9] 巨大的黄色起重机点缀着画面。它们伸向天空，在灰色调中向着烟雾迷蒙的地平线退去。下方广阔工地上，绿色网栏、沙袋墙和成堆钢筋划出区域，戴黄色头盔的工人显得十分微小。作品的长横幅格式类似中国传统卷轴画，但它并不邀请观者的目光在自然景观中蜿蜒游走、沿途驻足沉思；其透视性的摄影写实主义坚持从高处俯视，俯视无数无名者在意识形态的再造——一次再世界营造（re-worlding）——中翻掘大地，重塑中国的社会生活。[10] 王能涛的标题暗示，这种规模宏大的努力如何动摇了过去的政治工程——共产党的阶级革命和土地改革——以及北京这类城市中的日常生活。

In my field notes from the same year, I posed a question about the relationship between contemporary art and Beijing: Am I trying to write an ethnography about a city in which art plays a part or an ethnography about art in which the city plays a part? This book explores the questions that unfolded from that one. How do aesthetics do more than simply reflect political, social, and economic change? How does cultural production, as once theorized by Chinese Communist intellectuals, actively shape collective consciousness and social identity, perceptions of time and space, and visions of the world? What is the legacy of past forms of visual praxis on contemporary production? How are envisioned timespaces always-already uneven and gendered? The construction site in Subversion-Earth provides a metaphor for a central tension in my account of Chinese contemporary art during the first years of the new millennium: between the power of art to represent, at large or from above, a cultural entity like Beijing or China or even the world and the potentially subversive activity of the artist, at large in its streets and alleys, monuments and ruins, lived histories and intimate interiors.

已经不均匀，并且被性别化？《颠覆——土地》中的工地，为我叙述新千年最初几年中国当代艺术提供了一个核心张力的隐喻：一边是艺术从整体上或从高处再现北京、中国乃至世界这类文化实体的力量，另一边是艺术家在大街小巷、纪念碑与废墟、生活历史与私密内室中逍遥游荡、可能具有颠覆性的活动。

As I traversed streets plastered with slogans like “New Century, New Beijing,” I practiced, in my minor and temporary way, something most residents did. I mapped the city and my relationship to it, to what had been, to what was marked for demolition, to what was being torn down, and to what was being built. People talked all the time about the chaiqian (demolition and relocation) politics of urban renewal ubiquitous in Chinese cities, about the logic or the injustice of it, about how favorite haunts had disappeared overnight or how they could no longer find their way around once familiar neighborhoods. Some artists seized the moment as an opportunity to move out of the studio—with still and video cameras, spray paint, mirrors, bricks, fabric, ice, and their own bodies—to create site-specific works about this epochal process.

当我穿行于贴满“新世纪、新北京”之类标语的街道时，我以自己微小而短暂的方式，实践着大多数居民都在做的事。我绘制城市，也绘制我与城市的关系，与曾经存在之物、与标记为待拆之物、与正在被推倒之物和正在建起之物的关系。人们不断谈论中国城市中无处不在的城市更新拆迁（chaiqian）政治，谈论其中的逻辑或不公，谈论心爱的去处如何一夜之间消失，或他们如何再也认不出曾经熟悉的街区。一些艺术家抓住这一刻，走出画室——带着照相机和摄像机、喷漆、镜子、砖块、布料、冰以及自己的身体——创作关于这一划时代进程的特定场域作品。

I tracked their role in China’s endeavor to “link tracks with the world” (yu shijie jiegui). In 2001 alone, China entered the wto, Beijing won its bid to host the 2008 Olympics, and the men’s national soccer team qualified for the first time to compete in the 2002 World Cup. This sequence of events briefly gave rise to the phrase ru shi, meaning “to enter the world,” or in a pun playing on the Chinese homophones of world and city, “to enter the city.” This conflation of Beijing, China, and the world shimmered with the anticipation of having finally arrived. It played off of, even as it diminished, the Maoist commitment to “enter the life” (shenru shenghuo) of the exploited classes and rural peasantry in order to represent them. Urbanism, the privileging of city over country as site of growth, excitement, and futurity, became the mandate of the day. I followed artists and their interlocutors from art classrooms to cramped apartment studios to an expanding number of local exhibition spaces, through a city that many likened to a massive construction zone. Male rural migrants labored night and day on the skeletons of high-rise buildings. Migrant women worked in restaurants, hair salons, entertainment spaces, and private homes. Urban workers laid off from “iron-rice-bowl” jobs in state-owned enterprises struggled to survive in a new market economy. Students and strivers from the provinces, expats from Hong Kong, Taiwan, Korea, Japan, and beyond entered this border zone of city and country, socialism and capitalism, nation and world, memory and dream. Dust hung in the air. Cranes swung through the sky. The chemical smell of urban renewal wafted through the streets.

我追踪他们在中国努力“与世界接轨”（yu shijie jiegui）中的角色。仅 2001 年一年，中国加入世贸组织，北京赢得 2008 年奥运会主办权，国家男子足球队首次获得 2002 年世界杯参赛资格。这一连串事件短暂催生了“入世”一词——意为“进入世界”，又借“世”与“市”的中文同音双关，可读作“进入城市”。北京、中国与世界三者的这种融合，因终于抵达的期待而闪闪发光。它借用、甚至削弱了毛泽东主义关于“深入生活”（shenru shenghuo）、即深入被剥削阶级和农村农民生活以再现他们的承诺。城市主义——把城市而非乡村视为增长、兴奋与未来的场所——成为时代任

务。我跟随艺术家及其对话者，从艺术教室到逼仄的公寓画室，再到数量不断扩张的地方展览空间，穿行于一座被许多人比作巨大工地的城市。男性农村移民在高楼骨架上日夜劳作。女性移民在餐馆、发廊、娱乐场所和私人住宅中工作。从国有企业“铁饭碗”岗位下岗的城市工人，在新的市场经济中艰难求生。来自各省的学生和奋斗者，从香港、台湾、韩国、日本及其他地方移居而来的人，进入这座城乡之间、社会主义与资本主义之间、民族与世界之间、记忆与梦想之间的边界地带。尘土悬在空中。起重机在头顶摆动。城市更新的化学气味在街道上飘荡。

China's transition from a socialist political economy toward integration with transnational capitalism affected visual art production in numerous ways. The state relaxed orthodox political authority over art, although this process was intermittent and not without reversal. As state stipends dwindled, artists sought new channels of support and commission. Many threw themselves into experimenting with aesthetic form and found themselves navigating emergent market forces. Chinese contemporary art began to circulate in international and developing domestic markets, becoming subject to multiple modes of interpretation and evaluation. Art academies and exhibition spaces underwent reorganization and semiprivatization. The artists I came to know negotiated this nexus of state cultural control, market economics, and gender politics in the attempt to earn a living and make and exhibit their work.

中国从社会主义政治经济向跨国资本主义整合的转型，以多种方式影响了视觉艺术生产。国家放松了对艺术的正统政治权威，尽管这一过程时断时续，也并非没有反复。随着国家补贴减少，艺术家寻找新的支持和委托渠道。许多人投身审美形式实验，发现自己要在新兴市场力量中摸索前行。中国当代艺术开始在国际市场和发展中的国内市场流通，受到多种解释和评价模式的支配。美术院校和展览空间经历重组与半私有化。我逐渐认识的艺术家们，在国家文化控制、市场经济与性别政治的交汇处协商，努力谋生、创作和展出作品。

By and large, they belonged to an in-between generation, born between the late 1950s and early 1970s, whose experiences spanned the transition from socialism to "reform and opening." They had some personal memory of the Cultural Revolution; some had even been sent-down youth who spent years in the countryside. Many had trained in China's top national art academies, in Beijing, Hangzhou, or Chongqing, where they mastered the techniques of socialist realism, even if they later discarded these for experiments in performance, installation, or video art. Some waxed nostalgic over the "culture fever" (wenhua re) years of the 1980s, when they gained access to texts, theories, and forms of art suppressed under Mao and immersed themselves in intense debates that went on late into the night.[11] They had lived through the cultural and political crackdown after the 1989 protests in Tiananmen Square. They had witnessed the impact of accelerating market reforms after Deng Xiaoping's 1992 Tour of the South and pronouncement that China link tracks with the world through trade. As the millennial premise of Beijing as global city came to increasingly depend on the development of a cultural economy rather than an industrial one, they got caught up, energized and conflicted by this new relationship between capital and culture. Their paths through the city traced a network that extended in new ways to other parts of China and the world, the past and the present. Their experiences, stories, artworks, and actions mapped discrepant transnational connections across space and time. How these maps were drawn depended on social positionality, with coordinates shaped by gender, class, and rural-urban identity.

总的来说，他们属于夹在中间的一代，出生于 20 世纪 50 年代末到 70 年代初，其经历横跨从社会主义到“改革开放”的转型。他们对文化大革命还有个人记忆；有些人甚至当过知青，在乡下度过

If Wang Nengtao’s Subversion captures the massive turning over of the urban landscape, Yin Xiuzhen’s 2001 Portable Cities–Beijing (figure Intro.01) packs it into a suitcase. Displayed on the floor, the suitcase lies open to reveal frame-supported fabric, cut and engineered to resemble architectural elements of the cityscape. The small, rumpled, and soft structures interject the alienating modern megacity with the domestic intimacy of human wear and dwelling.[12] Made from clothing once worn by the artist and her family members, the piece represents Beijing as a ring of buildings circling the open green space of a stretched shirt. Pulled inward, the sleeve leads the viewer’s eye down to a macro lens that displays in miniature a map of the city circa 1949 affixed to the bottom of the suitcase. A speaker inside plays Beijing opera sung by elderly amateurs recorded in Shichahai Park, a popular public space north of the Forbidden City flooded by 2001 with trendy restaurants, bars, and bicycle rickshaw tours of old hutong alleyways.

如果说王能涛的《颠覆》捕捉了城市景观的大规模翻掘，尹秀珍 2001 年的《便携城市——北京》（导论图 01）则把它装进一只手提箱。手提箱摊开在地面，露出由框架支撑的布料，这些布料经剪裁和设计，形似城市景观的建筑元素。那些小巧、皱褶、柔软的结构，以人体穿着与栖居的居家亲密感，插入这座令人疏离的现代特大城市。[12] 作品用艺术家及其家人穿过的旧衣制成，把北京表现为一环建筑，环绕着一件被拉抻的衬衫所呈现的绿色空地。袖子被向内拉，引导观者的视线向下落到一枚微距镜头上，镜头在微缩中显示一张约 1949 年的北京地图，贴在箱底。箱内扬声器播放着老年业余爱好者在什刹海公园唱的京剧录音；什刹海是故宫以北的热门公共空间，2001 年时已被时尚餐馆、酒吧和老胡同三轮车游览挤满。

The only recognizable building is the Central Radio and tv Tower, which marks the suitcase's outer rim as the Third Ring Road. All of central Beijing has disappeared in a taut expanse of green fabric pulled into a slightly off-center vortex with a diminishing view of the historical capital. This timehole, with its soundtrack of disembodied Beijing opera singers, eerily empties the center, a site of massive razing and rebuilding, including the soon-to-be-demolished hutong where Yin and her artist husband Song Dong lived during the creation of this piece. Within a few years, its defining monument would be outdated, surpassed in size, ambition, and international reputation by the new China Central Television Headquarters designed by Rem Koolhaas as anchor to Beijing's new Central Business District. Portable Beijing serves as a premonition of the accelerating changes to come, while also giving shelter to the tactility of memory and personal history.

唯一可辨认的建筑是中央广播电视塔，它标记着手提箱外缘即三环路。整个北京中心在绷紧的绿色布料中消失，布料被拉成一个略偏中心的漩涡，历史首都的视野随之缩小。这个时间空洞伴随着只闻其声、不见其人的京剧演唱，令人不安地掏空了城市中心；那里是大规模拆建之地，包括尹秀珍和她的艺术家丈夫宋冬创作这件作品时居住的、不久将被拆除的胡同。几年之内，这座标志性建筑就会显得过时，在规模、雄心和国际声誉上被雷姆·库哈斯设计的新中央电视台总部超越——后者成为北京新中央商务区的锚点。《便携北京》预示了即将到来且不断加速的变化，同时也庇护着记忆与个人历史的触感。

Portable Beijing was the first in what became a series titled Portable Cities. As Yin Xiuzhen began receiving commissions to create new works in locations around the world, she frequently found herself in transit. The idea for Portable Cities came to her while waiting at an airport baggage claim, when she suddenly saw each suitcase as the home a traveler tries to carry with her.[13] She fabricated the pieces in the series from old clothing gathered at their respective sites of creation: Shanghai, Singapore, Sydney, New York, Berlin, Paris.... As these portable cities accumulated, Yin began to exhibit them as an ensemble mapping her travels (figure Intro.02). On an oceanic blue wall behind the open suitcases, yellow buttons serve as drop pins for each city, connected by strands of yellow yarn. While Beijing now appears as one among many networked global destinations, the familial specificity of the clothing in this first in series activates a different emotional energy, linking materiality and memory. Each piece of fabric evoked personal details of wear, care, and the passage of time. Yin recalled, for example, that she'd created a purple building from a shirt she once thought was very fashionable when her sister gave it to her.[14] She has also discussed how the act of sewing so central to her artistic practice produced a connection with her mother, who once worked in a clothing factory and sometimes took up needle and thread to help Yin with her artwork.[15] Portable Beijing as the point of origin for Portable Cities stitches together intergenerational histories of home and state: of women's virtue performed through needlework as emblem of domesticity, of female labor mobilized into socialist industrial production, and of gendered global commodity chains. It vacillates between the touch and feel of home and everywhere-nowhere market reproducibility.

《便携北京》是后来名为《便携城市》系列的第一件。随着尹秀珍开始接到在世界各地创作新作品的委托，她经常处于旅途之中。《便携城市》的构想是她在机场行李提取处等候时产生的——她忽然把每只手提箱都看作旅行者试图随身携带的家。[13] 她用从各创作地收集来的旧衣制作这个系列的作品：上海、新加坡、悉尼、纽约、柏林、巴黎……随着这些便携城市不断累积，尹秀珍开始把它们作为整体展出，绘制出她的旅行地图（导论图 02）。在敞开的手提箱背后那片海洋蓝色的墙上，黄色纽扣作为每座城市的地图图钉，由黄毛线连接。北京现在只是众多联网全球目的地之一，

但这一系列中第一件作品的衣物所承载的家庭具体性，激发出另一种情感能量，把物质性与记忆连接起来。每块布料都唤起关于穿着、照料和时间流逝的个人细节。例如，尹秀珍回忆道，她用一件衬衫做了一座紫色建筑，当年她的姐妹把这件衬衫送给她时，她觉得它非常时髦。[14] 她也谈过，缝纫这一在她艺术实践中居于核心的行为，如何把她与母亲连接起来——母亲曾在服装厂工作，有时会拿起针线帮尹秀珍做作品。[15] 作为《便携城市》的起点，《便携北京》缝合起关于家与国家的代际历史：女性通过针线活操演美德，作为居家的象征；女性劳动被动员进社会主义工业生产；以及性别化的全球商品链。《便携北京》在家的触摸与感觉和无处不在又无处可寻的市场可复制性之间摇摆。

If Wang Nengtao's Subversion and Yin Xiuzhen's Portable Beijing ruminate on China's capital as construction site and global city in the making, in which art and urbanism are articulated together, Chen Lingyang's 25:00 continues their study of scale, with a cityscape haunted by gender politics (plate 2). In this photographic dreamspace, one in a two-piece series, a nude giantess looms within Beijing's built environment. The angle of perspective in the long scroll-like photograph, as in Wang's, comes from above, although here the only visible human figure miniaturizes the buildings. It is the artist's own body at the center of the image, lying face down on top of an apartment block, her exposed spine aligned with its central axis. Her head dangles over the edge, hair hanging down like that of an ink brush. The female figure appears huge yet vulnerable, as she comes into sensuous contact with a city where new commercial buildings rise above socialist work-unit housing. Exhibited as a transparency in an illuminated lightbox, the image glows with a dark, magic-hour intensity. Of this series, Chen comments: "Very often, the real world and the male world get mixed up in my mind. They both come from outside me; they both exist very forcefully, with initiative, power, and aggression. Facing these two worlds, I often feel that I am weak and helpless, and don't know what to do. But just being alive means that I cannot avoid them, not even for one day. I wish that every day there could be a certain time like 25:00, when I could become as large as I like, and do whatever I want."[16] This larger-than-life figuration exists in temporal ephemerality.

如果说王能涛的《颠覆》和尹秀珍的《便携北京》思考的是作为工地和形成中的全球城市的中国首都——艺术与城市主义在其中被一起表述——那么陈羚羊的《25:00》延续了它们对尺度的研究，

呈现一个被性别政治萦绕的城市景观（图版 2）。在这幅摄影梦境空间（由两件作品构成的系列中的一件）中，一个裸体的女巨人隐现在北京的建筑环境中。与王能涛的作品一样，这幅长卷式照片的视角来自上方，不过这里唯一可见的人形使建筑显得微小。那是艺术家自己的身体，位于图像中心，俯卧在一栋公寓楼顶上，裸露的脊柱与楼的中央轴线对齐。她的头悬在边缘，头发垂下如毛笔。这个女性形象看似巨大，却脆弱，她与一座城市发生感官接触，那里新的商业建筑高耸于社会主义单位住房之上。作品作为透明胶片在发光的灯箱中展出，影像以幽暗的“魔幻时刻”强度闪耀。关于这个系列，陈羚羊说：“现实世界和男性世界常常在我头脑中混在一起。它们都来自我之外；它们都非常强力地存在，带着主动性、力量和侵略性。面对这两个世界，我常常觉得自己软弱无助，不知道该怎么办。但只是活着就意味着我无法回避它们，一天也不行。我希望每天都能有像 25:00 这样的某个时刻，让我想变多大就变多大，想做什么就做什么。”[16] 这个超越真人大小的形象存在于时间性的短暂之中。

25:00 raises questions about the politics of representation in Chinese contemporary art: about how gender matters in terms of art world access and recognition; how art shapes understandings of femininity and masculinity; and how gender and sexuality figure centrally in conceptions of China's modernity and worldliness. While several important historical accounts document Chinese contemporary art from the 1980s on, questions of gender and feminism in them remain an afterthought, relegated to single chapters or subsections of these thick volumes.[17] Informed by a rich body of scholarship that has demonstrated the significance of precisely these questions in China's development as a modern nation-state, its revolutionary politics and market reform, Experimental Beijing confronts this sidelining of gender in the story of art.[18] It asks what a focus on gender, as central rather than epiphenomenal, reveals about an emerging art world. In the next section, an overview of influential exhibits from the two decades preceding the new millennium provides historical context. The politics of representation that played out in these exhibits, inside and outside of China, resulted in a new artistic political grammar.[19] Avant-garde became coded as liumang (hooligan) and masculine.[20] Female artists, largely excluded from this realm of activity, found their work contained within a new domesticating and marginalizing category of nüxing yishu (feminine or women's art). My feminist intent throughout this book is to deconstruct this restrictive, binaristic liumang/nüxing political grammar in order to make a new form of storytelling possible.

《25:00》提出了关于中国当代艺术再现政治的问题：性别在艺术界的进入与承认方面如何重要；艺术如何塑造对女性气质与男性气质的理解；性别与性如何在中国现代性与世界性的构想中占据中心位置。尽管已有若干重要的历史著述记录 20 世纪 80 年代以来的中国当代艺术，但其中的性别与女性主义问题仍属事后附笔，被降格为这些厚重著作中的单一章节或小节。[17] 有丰富的学术成果已经证明，恰恰是这些问题在中国作为现代民族国家的发展、革命政治与市场改革中具有重要意义；《实验北京》以此为参照，直面艺术叙事中对性别的边缘化。[18] 本书追问，当性别被置于中心而非附带现象的位置，它能揭示一个新兴艺术界的什么。下一节将概述新千年之前二十年间有影响力的展览，以提供历史语境。这些展览在中国内外展开的再现政治，形成了一种新的艺术政治语法。[19] 前卫被编码为流氓（liumang）和男性气质。[20] 女性艺术家大体被排除在这一活动领域之外，她们的作品被收进一个新的、驯化且边缘化的“女性艺术”（nüxing yishu）范畴。本书贯穿始终的女性主义意图，是解构这种限制性的、二元对立的流氓/女性政治语法，从而让一种新的讲故事形式成为可能。

On February 5, 1989, China/Avant-Garde opened in Beijing at the National Art Museum of China. Six long black banners draped down the entrance stairs announced the exhibition title and displayed the red and white insignia of a no U-turn sign. This survey show, including 297 pieces by 186 artists, represented a culmination of the many art activities and groups that had emerged over the previous decade.[21] In 1979, several unofficial art exhibits, building on the energy of the Beijing Spring Democracy Movement, attracted broad attention. The Stars Art Exhibition remains the best known of these efforts. Staged on the street outside of the National Art Museum, it featured work by young artists with little to no formal training. Art colleges had been shut throughout the Cultural Revolution and only began to readmit students in 1978. Some of the work by the Stars group explicitly attacked Maoist ideology, and police shut the exhibit down after two days. Stars members responded by holding a public demonstration on October 1, the thirtieth anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China. By the mid-1980s, intellectual debates about reestablishing humanism in the aftermath of the Cultural Revolution and art trends such as the normalization of nudity in painting signaled an ongoing liberalization of culture. Numerous unofficial art groups and interlocutors of Western modernist styles sprouted up around the country. This efflorescence of artistic experiments and theories eventually became known at the '85 Art New Wave.[22]

1989 年 2 月 5 日，中国现代艺术展（China/Avant-Garde）在北京中国美术馆开幕。六条长长的黑色横幅从入口台阶垂下，宣告展览标题，并展示红白两色的“禁止掉头”标志。这场汇集 186 位艺术家 297 件作品的综述展，代表了此前十年间涌现的众多艺术活动和群体的顶点。[21] 1979 年，几场非官方艺术展借北京之春民主运动的能量吸引了广泛关注。星星美展仍是这些努力中最著名的一例。展览在中国美术馆外的街道上举行，展出几乎没有受过正规训练的年轻艺术家的作品。文化大革命期间美术院校全部停办，直到 1978 年才开始重新招生。星星画会的一些作品明确抨击毛泽东主义意识形态，警方在两天后关闭了展览。星星成员于 10 月 1 日——中华人民共和国成立三十周年——举行公开示威作为回应。到 20 世纪 80 年代中期，关于在文化大革命之后重建人道主义的知识界辩论，以及绘画中裸体正常化等艺术潮流，标志着文化持续自由化。众多非官方艺术团体和西方现代主义风格的呼应者在全国各地涌现。这场艺术实验和理论的繁盛最终被称为“85 美术新潮”。[22]

By the time of the China/Avant-Garde exhibition, interest in this burgeoning art scene had developed in China. As audience members, who had turned out on the eve of Chinese New Year, wandered through the galleries, two shots rang out. Artist Xiao Lu had drawn a handgun and fired into her piece Dialogue, shattering a mirror at the center of the installation. Police arrested her and Tang Song, another artist at the scene whom they assumed was involved, and closed the exhibit. It reopened several days later, only to be suspended one more time due to pieces in violation of the organizers' contract with the museum not to exhibit performance art, as well as a false bomb threat. Nonetheless, it came to be known as an important retrospective of the artistic energies unleashed during the 1980s, and from the perspective of many I met during my fieldwork, the last interesting thing to happen at the National Art Museum of China. Just three months after the exhibit, the growing student protests in Tiananmen Square captured international media attention. Following the events of June 4, 1989, authorities shut down several prominent art magazines, and artists who had participated in China/Avant-Garde experienced difficulty showing in official venues. Some, like Xiao Lu and Tang Song, left the country.

到中国现代艺术展举办时，中国国内对这蓬勃艺术场景的兴趣已经发展起来。观众在农历新年前夕前来观展，在展厅间游荡时，两声枪响响起。艺术家肖鲁掏出手枪，朝自己的作品《对话》开枪，击碎了装置中央的一面镜子。警方逮捕了她和现场另一名艺术家唐宋——他们以为他也参与其中——并关闭了展览。几天后展览重开，却因有作品违反主办方与美术馆签订的不展出行为艺术的协议，以及一次虚假炸弹威胁，再次被暂停。尽管如此，它仍被视为 20 世纪 80 年代释放的艺术能量的重要回顾展；从我田野调查中遇到的许多人来看，这是中国美术馆发生的最后一件有趣的事。展览仅仅三个月后，天安门广场上不断增长的学生抗议吸引了国际媒体注意。1989 年 6 月 4 日事件之后，当局关闭了几本知名艺术杂志，参与中国现代艺术展的艺术家在官方场所展出遭遇困难。一些人，如肖鲁和唐宋，离开了中国。

In the climate of tension and uncertainty that ensued, officials viewed Chinese art labeled "avant-garde" as a suspect manifestation of liberal bourgeois tendencies. With equal conviction, the international art market embraced it as an emblem of resistance to authoritarian oppression.[23] During the 1990s, this art toured an ever-widening international circuit. China's New Art, Post-1989, an exhibit featuring many of the China/Avant-Garde artists, opened at the Hong Kong Arts Centre and City Hall in 1993. Co-organized by Beijing critic and curator Li Xianting and Hong Kong art collector Chang Tsong-zung, it shaped international knowledge of Chinese contemporary art and the careers of a select group of almost exclusively male artists. After Hong Kong, a scaled-down version traveled to London, Sydney, and Melbourne, and from 1995 to 1998 to the North American cities of Vancouver; Eugene, Oregon; Fort Wayne, Indiana; Salina, Kansas; Chicago; and San Jose, California. Other exhibitions in Europe—China Avant-Garde: Counter-Currents in Art and Culture (1993) in Berlin, Reckoning with the Past (1996) in Edinburgh, and China! (1996) in Bonn—featured many of the same artists.[24]

在随之而来的紧张与不确定气氛中，官员把标为“前卫”的中国艺术视为自由资产阶级倾向的可疑表现。国际艺术市场则以同样的确信，将其奉为反抗威权压迫的象征。[23] 20 世纪 90 年代，这类艺术巡展于日益扩大的国际路线。《后八九中国新艺术》（China's New Art, Post-1989）收录了许多中国现代艺术展的艺术家，于 1993 年在香港艺术中心及大会堂开幕。展览由北京批评家、策展人栗宪庭与香港艺术收藏家张颂仁共同组织，塑造了国际对中国当代艺术的认知，也塑造了一批几乎全为男性的入选艺术家的职业生涯。香港之后，一个缩小版巡展至伦敦、悉尼和墨尔本，并于

1995 年至 1998 年前往北美城市温哥华；俄勒冈州尤金；印第安纳州韦恩堡；堪萨斯州萨利纳；芝加哥；以及加州圣何塞。欧洲的其他展览——柏林《中国前卫：艺术与文化的逆流》（1993）、爱丁堡《清算过去》（1996）、波恩《中国!》（1996）——展出了许多相同的艺术家。[24]

I first grew interested in Chinese contemporary art while working in Beijing as an English teacher from 1992 to 1994. Given official constraints on exhibition during this period, most of what I learned came from books, photos, and stories shared by students and friends. My earliest encounter with artworks occurred in San Francisco in 1999, when Inside Out: New Chinese Art brought the first comprehensive survey of this work to major U.S. museums.[25] Gao Minglu, cocurator of China/Avant-Garde in Beijing who had since become a Harvard PhD candidate in art history, provided the main curatorial vision for the exhibit. It included some artists from Hong Kong and Taiwan but largely represented the canon and connections forged by Gao in the formative moment of 1989. After opening at the Asia Society Galleries and P.S. 1 Contemporary Art Center in New York, Inside Out traveled to San Francisco's Museum of Modern Art and Asian Art Museum. On both coasts, the collaboration between institutions devoted to Asian art and modern and contemporary art represented an effort to disrupt conventional Western ideas about Chinese art as relegated to antiquities. Gary Garrels, SFMoMA chief curator of painting and sculpture, noted in an exhibit symposium that Inside Out was the museum's first showing of Chinese art, and aside from a few forays into postwar Japanese art, its first comprehensive exhibit of artwork from Asia. This inclusion of Chinese art within Western museums of modern art departed from traditional orientalist museology, yet the framing of Inside Out as an exhibit of "underground" or "unofficial" art resulted in a politicized understanding of it as dissent against an authoritarian, Communist state.[26] An intended decolonizing move led to a recolonizing move, with the art still framed by an East-West politics.

我最初对中国当代艺术产生兴趣，是 1992 年至 1994 年在北京教英语期间。由于当时官方对展览的限制，我学到的东西大多来自书本、照片以及学生和朋友分享的故事。我与艺术作品的最早遭遇发生在 1999 年的旧金山，当时《由内而外：新中国艺术》将这一艺术的首个全面综述带到美国主要博物馆。[25] 高名潞曾是北京中国现代艺术展的联合策展人，后来成为哈佛大学艺术史博士候选人，他为展览提供了主要策展视野。展览包括一些来自香港和台湾的艺术家，但在很大程度上呈现了 1989 年那个形成性时刻由高名潞建立的正典与关系网络。展览在纽约亚洲协会画廊和 P.S.1 当代艺术中心开幕后，又巡展至旧金山现代艺术博物馆和亚洲艺术博物馆。美国东西两岸的合作都体现了致力于亚洲艺术与现代及当代艺术的机构之间的协作，试图颠覆西方关于中国艺术只属于古物的传统观念。旧金山现代艺术博物馆绘画与雕塑部首席策展人加里·加雷尔斯在展览研讨会上指出，《由内而外》是该馆首次展出中国艺术，除了少数几次对战后日本艺术的涉猎外，也是其首个亚洲艺术综合展。将中国艺术纳入西方现代艺术博物馆，偏离了传统东方主义博物馆学，然而《由内而外》将自身框定为“地下”或“非官方”艺术展，导致一种政治化理解，即它是对威权共产主义国家的异见。[26] 一次本意去殖民化的行动，转而成了再殖民化的行动：艺术仍被东西方政治框定。

The 1990s association of the Chinese avant-garde with a liumang attitude of rebellion and spiritual malaise, expressed through styles indentified as Cynical Realism and Political Pop, was established not only through an oppositional relationship with the Chinese state, but through transnational circulation. Exhibits in pre-handover Hong Kong, Europe, and the United States and the growing interest of foreign collectors and auction houses contributed to the discursive production of a repressed, heroic body of art that could only be exhibited and appreciated outside of China. The lack of female artists in these exhibits fed assumptions about Chinese women as even more repressed, understood to be delayed by culture and tradition. For example, at the SFMoMA Inside Out symposium, critic and curator Britta Erickson, who moderated a panel on identity, pointed out that of the seventy artists in the exhibit, only six were women. Of these, she continued, the majority hailed from Hong Kong and Taiwan and had been positively influenced by Western feminism in studies abroad.

20 世纪 90 年代，中国前卫艺术与一种流氓式的反叛和精神萎靡态度联系在一起，并通过“玩世现实主义”和“政治波普”等风格表现出来。这种联系不仅通过与中国国家权力的对抗关系建立，也通过跨国流通建立。在回归前的香港、欧洲和美国的展览，以及外国收藏家和拍卖行日益增长的兴趣，共同推动了一种话语生产：一套被压抑、英雄化的艺术，似乎只能在中国之外展出和欣赏。这些展览中女性艺术家的缺席，强化了关于中国女性受到更深压抑的假设，被理解为被文化和传统所耽搁。例如，在旧金山现代艺术博物馆《由内而外》研讨会上，主持身份专题讨论的批评家、策展人林似竹（Britta Erickson）指出，展览的七十位艺术家中只有六位女性。她继续说，其中大多数来自香港和台湾，在国外学习时受到西方女性主义的积极影响。

In my research, I frequently heard echoes of this Western narrative of progress, with Linda Nochlin's famous question of "why have there been no great women artists?" reformulated as "does China have any great women artists?"[27] Western and Chinese art world participants alike engaged in this line of questioning, and by the mid-1990s several responses arose. In China the term nüxing yishu—usually translated as "women's art" or "feminine art" but sometimes also shorthand for nüxingzhuyi yishu or "feminist art"—began to appear around 1995, the year Beijing hosted the United Nations Fourth World Conference on Women. While Chinese leaders intended for the conference to showcase Chinese women's advanced social position to the world, Western media coverage of the conference framed the Chinese state as hostile to capitalist democracy and its definition of human rights and insinuated that China had not yet fully freed their women to enjoy such rights.[28] This grammar of international feminism presumes the universal similarity of women who should seek justice through a Western model, effectively ignoring the Chinese feminist record: a women's liberation movement well over a century long. Nüxing yishu emerged as a response, produced every bit as much through transnational encounter as its liumang analogue. In 1995, it served as the organizational logic for two small-scale exhibits: Natural Feminine Art organized by Lin Zi in Kunming; and Women's Approach to Chinese Contemporary Art curated by Liao Wen in Beijing.[29] In 1998, Century Woman at Beijing's National Art Museum showcased work by seventy Chinese women under the rubric of "women's art." This flurry of activity brought recognition to female artists marginalized by post-1989 international art market trends, but the institutionalization of nüxing yishu also led to domesticating containment. Jia Fangzhou, curator of Century Woman, delineated in his preface to the exhibit catalogue the "essential characteristics of women's art," including among them childlike fantasy; apathy toward politics, history, and philosophy; and general disinterest in the male world.[30]

在我的研究中，我经常听到这种西方进步叙事的回声：琳达 • 诺克林那句著名的问题 “ 为什么没有伟大的女性艺术家？ ” 被改写成 “ 中国有伟大的女性艺术家吗？ ”[27] 西方和中国艺术界的参与者都参与这条追问；到 20 世纪 90 年代中期，出现了几种回应。在中国，“ 女性艺术 ”（nüxing yishu）一词——通常译为 “women’s art” 或 “feminine art”，有时也作为 “ 女性主义艺术 ”（nüxingzhuyi yishu）的简称——大约在 1995 年开始出现，那一年北京主办了联合国第四次世界妇女大会。中国领导人希望这次会议向世界展示中国妇女先进的社会地位，而西方媒体对会议的报道却把中国国家框定为敌视资本主义民主及其人权定义，并暗示中国尚未完全解放妇女以享受这些权利。[28] 这种国际女性主义的语法预设了女性的普遍相似性，她们应当通过西方模式寻求正义，实际上忽视了中国女性主义的记录：一场长达一个多世纪之久的妇女解放运动。“ 女性艺术 ” 作为回应出现，其产生与它的流氓对应物一样，同样经由跨国相遇而成。1995 年，它成为两个小规模展览的组织逻辑：Lin Zi 在昆明组织的《自然女性艺术》，以及廖雯在北京策划的《中国当代艺术中的女性方式》。[29] 1998 年，北京中国美术馆的《世纪 • 女性》以 “ 女性艺术 ” 为名展出七十位中国女性的作品。这一连串活动使被 1989 年后国际市场趋势边缘化的女性艺术家获得认可，但 “ 女性艺术 ” 的制度化也导致了驯化式的收编。《世纪 • 女性》策展人贾方舟在展览图录序言中勾勒 “ 女性艺术的本质特征 ”，其中包括孩童般的幻想；对政治、历史和哲学的冷漠；以及对男性世界的普遍不感兴趣。[30]

Exhibits organized by Western curators such as Half the Sky in Bonn, Germany, also contributed to these efforts of redress. This project originated in a protest action that took place on International Women’s Day in 1996, when supporters of the city’s Frauenmuseum barricaded the China! exhibit at Bonn’s Museum of Modern Art with a sign reading: “Today one cannot visit this museum! We are protesting against the lockout of Chinese women artists. It is impudent or at least foolish to claim that there is not a single woman artist among the Chinese population of 1.2 thousand million.”[31] The museum’s director responded by asserting there really were no women artists in China, and that the only interesting Chinese women working in the arts lived in exile overseas.[32] Half the Sky opened two years later, just a few months after Century Woman in Beijing, as the Frauenmuseum’s rebuttal to this spurious claim. While the consequence of locating the empowerment of Chinese women in a gallery outside of China was somewhat ameliorated by the German curators’ discovery of the Century Woman project, an ironic tension remains in their title based on Mao Zedong’s slogan “Women hold up half the sky.” It clashes with Chinese feminist attempts, as part of the overall reform-era debates about humanism, to excavate an individual female agency from the massified subject of Maoist state culture. Momentarily enabling as a response to marginalization, nüxing yishu eventually became a category that many artists who first exhibited under its auspices disavowed, because of how it limited their work and its impact on social life within the nation and beyond.

由西方策展人组织的展览，如德国波恩的《半边天》，也参与了这些补救努力。该项目源于 1996 年国际妇女节的一场抗议行动：当时波恩女性博物馆的支持者用标语堵住了波恩现代艺术博物馆的《中国 !》展览，标语写道：“ 今天不能参观这座博物馆！我们抗议中国女性艺术家被拒之门外。声称中国十二亿人口中连一位女性艺术家都没有，是无礼的，至少是愚蠢的。”[31] 博物馆馆长回应称，中国确实没有女性艺术家，唯一有趣的中国女性艺术工作者都流亡海外。[32] 两年后，《半边天》开幕，时间就在北京《世纪 • 女性》之后几个月，作为女性博物馆对这一虚假说法的反驳。把中国女性的赋权安置在中国之外一家画廊里的后果，因德国策展人发现《世纪 • 女性》项目而在某种程度上得到缓解；但他们的标题借自毛泽东 “ 妇女能顶半边天 ” 的口号，仍留下一层讽刺性张力。这与中国女性主义者的尝试相冲突：作为改革时代关于人道主义的整体辩论的一部分，她们试图从毛泽东主义国家文化的集体化主体中挖掘出个体性的女性能动性。作为一种对边缘化的回应，“ 女性艺术 ” 曾短暂地具有赋能作用，但最终成为许多最初在其名下展出的艺术家所否弃的范畴，因

为它限制了她们的作品及其对国家内外社会生活的影响。

As I began fieldwork in Beijing in 2000, some of the male artists who had enjoyed success overseas expressed anxiety over how foreign consumption foreclosed interpretation of their work and threatened to turn it into a "made in China" export, collected and displayed in the West.[33] At the same time, I came to recognize that female artists had often performed support labor for this international circulation (as translators, teachers, wives, and mothers) or found their work restricted within the category of nüxing yishu. They likewise contended with the irony of their underrepresentation against a representational backdrop replete with female figures: martyrs for and models of revolutionary nationalism and reform-era embodiments of desire and excess. As official attitudes toward contemporary art shifted in the early 2000s, many male artists got caught up in the moment of national recognition and entrepreneurial cosmopolitanism. Some who achieved market success even moved toward a capitalist separation of mental and manual labor and outsourced production of their concepts.[34] Most women, however, still struggled for visibility, a situation that led some to develop a critical art practice marked by historiographical consciousness, in which conventional histories of art—global, national, and feminist—are queried and overturned from peripheral positions, of the socialist past, the rural, and the Chinese woman artist. These women excavated discarded female figures from the public symbology of their art training and from personal memory in order to deconstruct, remake, and revivify them. Their works do not fit neatly into canonical formations that emphasize progress of one order or another.

2000 年我开始在北京做田野调查时，一些在海外获得成功的男性艺术家表达了焦虑：外国消费如何封闭了对其作品的解释，并威胁将其变成“中国制造”的出口品，在西方被收藏和展示。[33] 与此同时，我认识到女性艺术家常常为这种国际流通承担支持性劳动（作为翻译、教师、妻子和母亲），或者发现自己的作品被限制在“女性艺术”范畴内。她们同样要面对一种反讽：在充满女性形象的再现背景下，她们却仍然代表性不足——那些女性形象是革命民族主义的烈士和模范，是改革时代欲望与过剩的化身。21 世纪初，随着官方对当代艺术的态度转变，许多男性艺术家卷入了国家承认和企业家式世界主义的时刻。一些取得市场成功的人甚至走向资本主义式的脑力与体力劳动分离，将概念交给外包生产。[34] 然而，大多数女性仍为可见性而挣扎；这种处境促使一些人发展出一种以历史编纂意识为标志的批评性艺术实践——从社会主义过去、农村和中国女性艺术家的边缘位置出发，质询并颠覆全球的、民族的和女性主义的艺术正史。这些女性从所受艺术训练的公共符号体系和私人记忆中挖掘被丢弃的女性形象，以解构、重造并使其重获生命。她们的作品无法整齐地嵌入强调某种秩序之进步的经典构型。

Chinese artists who gained international recognition often found their work framed by a narrative of universalism, in which naturalized assumptions about what art is, and how it is authenticated as such, operate. The interpretation of Chinese artists in terms like "the avant-garde" grants them member status in the global art world, but under a label that bears the imprimatur of earlier Euro-American movements and thus casts them as "catching up." This universalizing story, however, counter to the best intentions of many who invoke it, fails to recognize the cultural encounters and negotiations that shape artists' lives and the work they produce. Ethnography, as a form of research based in participant observation, provides everyday witness to these encounters as a way of theorizing about how they reflect and influence sociocultural phenomena on a larger scale. Feminist anthropologists have drawn attention to the relational epistemology of ethnography, as a form of knowledge produced through subjective relationships and shaped by difference and power.[35] As ethnographer, I immersed myself in the zone of encounter of Chinese contemporary art, in which aesthetic and cultural formations were forged through relationships across difference.[36] I became intimately aware of my positioning within this zone, every time I served as an interpreter for a foreign curator and considered my potential influence on an artist's career, every time I sat in a smoke-filled banquet room with a group of male artists and it was assumed that I was someone's foreign girlfriend, every time I sought out female artists to understand how they navigated this enervating terrain.

获得国际认可的中国艺术家，常常发现自己的作品被一种普遍主义叙事框定，其中关于什么是艺术、艺术如何被认证为艺术的自然化假设在起作用。以“前卫”这样的术语解释中国艺术家，赋予他们全球艺术界的成员资格，但这一标签带着早期欧美运动的印记，因此把他们塑造成“追赶者”。然而，这种普遍化故事与许多援引它的人的最佳意图相违，未能认识到塑造艺术家生活及其作品的文化相遇与协商。民族志作为基于参与观察的研究形式，为这些相遇提供日常见证，从而理论化它们如何反映并影响更大范围的社会文化现象。女性主义人类学家提请人们注意民族志的关系性认识论：知识通过主体间关系产生，并受差异与权力塑造。[35] 作为民族志学者，我沉浸在中国当代艺术的相遇地带，审美和文化形态在此通过跨越差异的关系被锻造。[36] 我深切意识到自己在这一地带中的位置：每当我为外国策展人担任翻译并考虑自己对艺术家职业生涯的可能影响时；每当我坐在烟雾缭绕的宴会厅里，与一群男性艺术家在一起，被想当然地当作某个人的外国女友时；每当我寻找女性艺术家，以理解她们如何穿行于这片令人疲惫的地形时。

The title of this chapter and section allude to Rosalind Krauss's "Sculpture in the Expanded Field." In this 1979 essay, she analyzes the historicism of postwar American art criticism, which assimilated modernist sculptural production into a universal formal category by constructing "a paternity" for it.[37] She argues that sculpture understood as a universal category alienates it from its historical boundedness and premodern logic of monumentality, as "it sits in a particular place and speaks in a symbolic tongue about the meaning or use of that place."[38] Modernist sculpture and its criticism turned the monument into abstraction, "functionally placeless and largely self-referential."[39] This autonomous mode of production would eventually collapse, as postmodern practice rejected modernism's repressive paternity and insisted on putting art back into place. Sculpture, put into relational antinomy or proximity with landscape and architecture, became but one possible form in the expanded field. Krauss's revisionist approach to the history of form suggests how a field like "Chinese contemporary art" needs expanding beyond historicist and hegemonic constructions: as either belated arrival on a global scene dominated by Western genealogies, or national patrimony of a China on the rise. The historical conditions through which Chinese contemporary art emerged necessitate an examination of aesthetics in relation to specific sites and histories, but without the presumption of national or cultural boundedness. This approach maps instead relational webs of meaning across space and time, deconstructing autonomous ideas of art as well as Eurocentric and masculinist discourses of belatedness.

本章及本节的标题都暗指罗莎琳德·克劳斯的《扩展场域中的雕塑》。在这篇 1979 年的文章中，她分析了战后美国艺术批评的历史主义——它通过为现代主义雕塑生产建构“一种父系”，将其吸收进一个普遍的形式范畴。[37] 她论证，把雕塑理解为普遍范畴，会使它脱离自身的历史限定性和前现代的纪念碑性逻辑，因为“它坐落在一个特定位置，并以象征性的语言谈论该位置的意义或用途。”[38] 现代主义雕塑及其批评把纪念碑变成抽象物，“在功能上无处所，且在很大程度上自我指涉。”[39] 这种自主的生产模式最终会崩溃，因为后现代实践拒绝现代主义的压制性父系，坚持让艺术回到原位。雕塑在与景观和建筑的关系性对立或邻近中被放置，成为扩展场域中众多可能形式之一。克劳斯对形式历史的修正主义路径表明，像“中国当代艺术”这样的场域需要扩展，超越历史主义和霸权性建构：要么是迟到地抵达一个由西方谱系主导的全球场景，要么是崛起中国的民族遗产。中国当代艺术得以出现的历史条件，要求我们在具体场所和历史中考察美学，但不预设民族或文化的边界。这种方法转而绘制跨越空间与时间的关系性意义网络，解构自主的艺术观念，也解构欧洲中心主义和男性主义的迟到论话语。

I label this field "Chinese contemporary art" rather than "contemporary Chinese art" because the works produced in the art worlds I describe most often get classified in China as dangdai yishu, literally meaning "contemporary art" but generally referring to works produced in particular media—oil painting, photography, video, installation, and performance art—seen as horizontally linked to contemporary art practice in the West.[40]

我把这个场域称为“Chinese contemporary art”（中国当代艺术），而不是“contemporary Chinese art”（当代中国的艺术），因为我所描述的艺术界中产生的作品，在中国最常被归类为“当代艺术”（dangdai yishu）——字面意思即“当代艺术”，但通常指以特定媒介创作的作品：油画、摄影、录像、装置和行为艺术，被视为与西方当代艺术实践横向相连。[40]

When I began my fieldwork, many Chinese friends and acquaintances outside this domain reproached me for my interest in it, telling me that it didn't really represent China. Art world participants I talked to were equally vexed, about the absence of a Chinese audience able to appreciate and understand their work. They earnestly debated and proposed ways to build a viewing public. By 2002, when I left Beijing after two years of fieldwork, the number of popular Chinese magazines devoted to dangdai yishu and of people beginning to frequent new contemporary art spaces gave an indication of their success.[41] This growing audience was part of China's burgeoning urban middle class, for whom learning to appreciate dangdai yishu signified cosmopolitan distinction. This shifting ground of in/authenticity makes contemporary art a compelling way to examine Chinese cultural politics. Artists as arbiters of world culture became public tastemakers and therefore inadvertent state actors. Some made the most of the moment, but many remained cagey and critical. They struggled over what their representational labor amounted to, and to whom it should appeal. Using Anna Tsing's metaphor of friction as the grip of encounter that drives global connections, close attention to the friction artists experienced and the images they produced in the process reveals how they also dig vertically into layers of history: of personal experience, of their training in institutions shaped by anticolonial nationalism and socialism, and of specific visual technologies and references.[42] These excavations are mixed and erratic, compiling an inventory of traces.[43] The more they "enter the world," the more acute their efforts at inventory become. Yin Xiuzhen's Portable Beijing, for example, conjures a life of transit and airport baggage carousels but also official visualizations of the capital city and gendered histories of needlework and factory labor.

我开始田野调查时，这一领域之外的许多中国朋友和熟人责备我对它感兴趣，告诉我它并不真正代表中国。与我交谈的艺术界参与者同样苦恼：中国缺乏能够欣赏和理解他们作品的观众。他们认真讨论并提出建立观看公众的方法。到 2002 年，当我结束两年田野调查离开北京时，专门报道当代艺术的通俗中文杂志数量，以及开始光顾新当代艺术空间的人数，显示出他们取得了一些成功。[41] 这一不断增长的观众是中国蓬勃发展的城市中产阶级的一部分；对他们来说，学会欣赏当代艺术意味着世界主义的区隔。这种真/伪边界的变动，使当代艺术成为考察中国文化政治的引人入胜的方式。艺术家作为世界文化的仲裁者，成为公共趣味制造者，因而也成了无意的国家行动者。一些人大加利用这一时刻，但许多人仍保持谨慎和批判。他们为自己再现劳动的意义以及应当吸引谁而挣扎。借用罗安清（Anna Tsing）关于摩擦的隐喻——摩擦是推动全球连接的相遇之抓握——密切关注艺术家经历的摩擦及其在此过程中生产的图像，可以揭示他们如何也纵向挖掘历史的层层沉积：个人经验的层、在反殖民民族主义和社会主义塑造的机构中受训的层，以及特定视觉技术和参照的层。[42] 这些挖掘混杂而游移，汇编成一份痕迹清单。[43] 他们越是“进入世界”，清点工作的努力就越敏锐。例如，尹秀珍的《便携北京》召唤出一种中转与机场行李传送带的生活，同时召唤出官方的首都视觉呈现，以及针线活和工厂劳动的性别化历史。

My analysis of this expanded field involves theoretical and methodological eclecticism at the intersection of anthropology, art history, and gender studies. In referring to the social realm of art production as an art world, I use a term coined by art critic Arthur Danto, who writes, “To see something as art requires something the eye cannot decry—an atmosphere of artistic theory, a knowledge of the history of art: an artworld.”[44] Sociologist Howard Becker elaborates on the term, to denote the collective activity that produces artworks and gives them aesthetic and sometimes other forms of value.[45] He demystifies the romantic cult of individual creation by demonstrating the diverse and coordinated activities of multiple participants necessary for art to be made and recognized as such. I refer to “art worlds” in the plural to indicate the multiple collectivities engaged in such activities; sometimes they overlap, other times they constitute themselves through antagonistic evaluations about what does or doesn’t count as art. Pierre Bourdieu’s theory of a “field of cultural production” argues that the artistic field cannot be reduced to a circumscribed group of people. Rather, it is one among other hierarchically organized, structurally homologous fields—the economic field, the educational field, the political field, among others—that coexist in relational play within the field of power.[46] Alfred Gell advocates an anthropology of art in which art objects serve not only as mediators between people but as social agents in and of themselves.

This focus on the personhood of art objects represents a turn away from isolated studies of "ethnic art" and sociological investigations of art institutions.[47] To the analysis of cultural production within a larger field of power, I add global and gendered dimensions. Chinese contemporary art is not a self-contained art world, a necessarily bourgeois pursuit, or a nationally circumscribed field of cultural production, but one structured by discrepant global connections and gender and class relations. While my analysis takes into account the role of institutions in amplifying or diminishing art's agency, it also takes seriously the agency of art objects. Their expressive enchantments are precisely what send them circulating through the world, carving shifting channels of transmission and extending object and personhood across space and time.[48]

这种对艺术品人格性的关注，代表着背离对 " 族群艺术 " 的孤立研究和对艺术机构的社会学调查。[47] 在更大权力场域内分析文化生产时，我加上了全球和性别维度。中国当代艺术不是一个自足的艺术界、一种必然的资产阶级追求，或一个民族限定的文化生产场域，而是一个由差异化的全球连接以及性别和阶级关系所结构的场域。我的分析虽然考虑机构在放大或削弱艺术能动性方面的作用，也认真对待艺术品的能动性。正是它们的表现性魅惑使它们在世界上流通，开辟不断变化的传播渠道，并把物与人格性延展于空间与时间之中。[48]

As an ethnographer, I understand my field to be more a habitus, "a cluster of embodied dispositions and practices," than a geographically bound site.[49] In Beijing I traced a network of locations that included art classrooms, artist villages, foreign-run commercial galleries, Chinese-run art centers in new real estate ventures, and vacated factories and warehouses turned into guerrilla gathering spaces or renovated Soho-style exhibit halls. This field as network also extended to a rural corner of Yunnan Province, art spaces in Shanghai and Hong Kong, and symposiums on Chinese contemporary art in San Francisco, London, and New York. I brought to this field a feminist disposition influenced by art historians who analyze the critical field of gender within cultural production. As they have demonstrated, constructions of gender difference produce artistic hierarchies that relegate women to lesser categories, limit their participation in dominant practices, and when they work through these limitations to become influential innovators, marginalize their contributions.[50]

作为民族志学者，我理解自己的田野与其说是一个地理限定的地点，不如说是一种惯习（habitus）——" 一组具身的性情与实践 "。[49] 在北京，我追踪一个地点网络，包括艺术教室、艺术家村、外国人经营的商业画廊、设在新房地产开发项目中的中国人经营的艺术中心，以及变成游击聚会空间或被改造成 Soho 式展厅的废弃工厂和仓库。作为网络的田野还延伸至云南省一个乡村角落、上海和香港的艺术空间，以及旧金山、伦敦和纽约关于中国当代艺术的研讨会。我把一种女性主义倾向带入这个田野，它受那些分析文化生产中性别批判场域的艺术史家影响。正如她们所证明的，性别差异的建构生产出艺术等级制，把女性归入较低范畴，限制她们参与主导实践；而当她们突破这些限制成为有影响力的创新者时，又将其贡献边缘化。[50]

Feminist analysis of the field of cultural production—as a zone of encounter between different valuations of culture—involves more than just paying attention to women. I read contemporary art world activity through the historical Chinese feminist analytic of nannü (male/female), theorized by He-Yin Zhen in her 1907 essay "On the Question of Women's Liberation."[51] For He-Yin, nannü signifies not simply gender difference but the ongoing production of social abstractions and markings that create hierarchy, inequality, and injustice. The conceptual mechanism of nannü youbie (male/female differentiation) actively produces distinction as a form of power and domination, and therefore can also assume an adjectival form, as in He-Yin's term nannü jie (nannü class).[52] Seen through this lens, the work of art becomes implicated in the production of such abstractions, whether of East and West, man and woman, or rural and urban. It reiterates symbolic orders, sometimes with a radical difference, always within a relationship of past to present. The iconic female revolutionary, red, bright, and shining in her militant rebellion and quest for modernity, haunts the redomesticated, depoliticized category of nüxing yishu; just as the iconic peasant hero, liberated by Mao's call for the countryside to surround and capture the cities, haunts Beijing as cultural capital where rural migrants provide the rationalized, flexibilized labor to build its new monuments of global achievement. While Beijing is ostensibly the national center, I analyze it as an always-already uneven and gendered timespace that depends on the countryside, ideologically and economically. I trace how artists traverse this timespace of rural-urban relationality: through their references to the socialist tradition of "representing the people"; creation of artist villages at city's edge; down-to-the-countryside pedagogical field trips; restaging of the Long March as art event; and employment and representation of rural migrants in experimental art practice.

对文化生产场域的女性主义分析——把它视为不同文化估值之间的相遇地带——不只是关注女性。我通过何殷震（He-Yin Zhen）在 1907 年《女子解放问题》一文中理论化的中国女性主义历史分析范畴“男女”（nannü）来阅读当代艺术界活动。[51] 对何殷震而言，“男女”不仅意味着性别差异，还意味着不断生产社会抽象和标记，从而创造等级、不平等和不公。“男女有别”（nannü youbie）的概念机制主动生产差异，作为一种权力和支配形式，因此它也可以采用形容词形式，如何殷震的“男女阶级”（nannü jie）一词。[52] 通过这一透镜，艺术作品便卷入了这类抽象的生产——无论是东方与西方、男人与女人，还是乡村与城市。它重申象征秩序，有时带着根本性差异，但始终处于过去与现在的关系之中。那个标志性的女性革命者——红色、明亮、闪耀，在战斗性的反叛与对现代性的追求中——萦绕在重新居家化、去政治化的“女性艺术”范畴之上；正如那位标志性的农民英雄——被毛泽东“农村包围城市并夺取城市”的号召所解放——萦绕在作为文化首都的北京之上：农村移民在那里提供理性化、灵活化的劳动，建造全球成就的新纪念碑。北京表面上是国家中心，我却把它分析为一个总是已经不均匀、被性别化的时空，它在意识形态上和经济上都依赖乡村。我追踪艺术家如何穿行于这种城乡关系性时空：通过援引“再现人民”的社会主义传统；在城市边缘创建艺术家村；下乡教学考察；把长征重演为艺术事件；以及在实验艺术实践中雇用和再现农村移民。

Throughout Experimental Beijing, a feminist lens highlights the contradictions of an emerging art world, the dialectical tension between monumental and ephemeral visions of life during the heady new millennium conflation of Beijing, China, and the world. These contradictions include artists who desire and resist institutional recognition by both foreign art professionals and Chinese state entities; artists who utilize experimental art forms to document social upheaval and inequality while also being enlisted to repress reform-era injustices by creating art-enhanced spaces for pleasure and status; the simultaneous valorization of the artist as heroic, suffering cultural critic and as cosmopolitan entrepreneur; and the underrepresentation of women as artists in the face of female overrepresentation in Chinese modern and contemporary figurative expression. While the latter is most obviously related to gender, attention to how women have been symbolically positioned and professionally marginalized throws these contradictions into sharp relief. Dominant narratives have smoothed over these contradictions. A focus on gender thus produces a nonnormative history of Chinese contemporary art and cultivates a differential consciousness about the shifting role of art—as ideological, institutional, and imaginative—within various configurations of power.

在《实验北京》全书中，女性主义透镜突显一个新兴艺术界的矛盾，以及在新千年令人兴奋的北京、中国与世界融合中，纪念碑式与转瞬即逝的生活想象之间的辩证张力。这些矛盾包括：艺术家既渴望又抵抗外国艺术专业人士和中国国家实体的体制承认；艺术家利用实验艺术形式记录社会动荡与不平等，同时又被征召去通过创造艺术化的愉悦与地位空间来遮蔽改革时代的不公；艺术家同时被尊崇为英雄式、受难的文化批评家以及企业家式世界主义者；女性作为艺术家的代表性不足，却在中国现代和当代具象表现中女性形象过剩。虽然后者最明显地与性别相关，但关注女性在象征上如何被安置、在职业上如何被边缘化，会使这些矛盾更鲜明。主导叙事已抹平了这些矛盾。因此，聚焦性别可以生产一部非规范的中国当代艺术史，并培养一种关于艺术在不断变化的权力配置中（作为意识形态的、制度的和想象性的）角色的差异意识。

As part of my habitus in the field, I conducted interviews with artists, art students and teachers, curators, and gallerists. I observed and drew and painted alongside students in art classrooms ranging from university-level academies to the state-run Children's Center. I traveled from the massive new studios built by artists who had "made it" to the dusty, cramped apartments of those struggling to get by, from white-cube galleries in central Beijing or on the Bund in Shanghai to the urban enclaves of rural migrants working as artists' assistants. As these interlocutors pulled me further into their worlds and visions of the world, I ended up interpreting for curators from the United States as they toured artists' studios, translating and writing catalogue texts, and filming a video documentary of a feminist art happening. I returned during the summers of 2004 and 2006 as the curator of a feminist art exhibit that opened in Shanghai before traveling to Beijing and eventually Hong Kong; and again during the summer of 2007 for follow-up research.[53] These activities constituted my participation observation and served as collaborative interventions into art world status quos.

我再次回去做后续研究。[53] 这些活动构成了我的参与观察，也成为对艺术界现状的协作干预。

This ethnography gradually moves toward a story of feminist encounter between artist and ethnographer. The first two parts of the book provide context. Part I: Art Worldings presents millennial Beijing poised to "enter the world" as a site of culture industry formation, in which art overcomes and activates a historical material dialectic with past visions of the world. It follows how various social actors rework meanings of xianfeng/avant-garde in assertions of Beijing as China's cultural capital, and how in the process they build new cultural institutions. Part II: Zones of Encounter presents two encounters between international curators and artists and Chinese counterparts: one in which the politics of cultural translation led to the exclusion of female artists from potential international circulation and another that became a protracted struggle over contending versions of feminism: international, national, and generational. This middle section of the book nests the story of feminist art encounters within the story of the global-local and East-West encounters that shape Chinese contemporary art. Parts I and II generate the analytic movement toward what I consider the book's heart and soul. The three chapters of part III: Feminist Sight Lines each focus on an individual artist with whom I had an extended relationship.

这部民族志逐渐走向艺术家与民族志学者之间女性主义相遇的故事。前两部分提供语境。第一部分“艺术世界营造”呈现千禧年北京作为文化产业形成之地，准备“进入世界”，艺术在其中克服并激活与过去世界图景的历史唯物辩证法。它追踪各种社会行动者如何在把北京确立为中国文化首都的主张中重新加工先锋/前卫（xianfeng/avant-garde）的含义，以及他们在此过程中如何建立新的文化机构。第二部分“相遇地带”呈现国际策展人与艺术家和中国同行之间的两次相遇：一次是文化翻译政治导致女性艺术家被排除在潜在国际流通之外，另一次演变为围绕国际、国家和代际等相互竞争的女性主义版本的长期斗争。这一中间部分把女性主义艺术相遇的故事嵌套进塑造中国当代艺术的全球—地方、东西方相遇的故事之中。第一、二部分共同推动分析走向我眼中本书的心脏与灵魂。第三部分“女性主义视线”的三章分别聚焦一位与我有着长期交往的艺术家。

In the course of my fieldwork, I came to know female artists like Yin Xiuzhen who have achieved international recognition and circulation, but in Feminist Sight Lines I highlight the lives and works of three artists—Li Tianpian, He Chengyao, and Lei Yan—whose careers have followed less visible trajectories. I interpret their work as feminist because of a critical historiographical consciousness cultivated by being on the periphery. My encounters with these artists, their stories, and their artworks shifted my understanding of feminist art. They make visible transnational and trans-historical connections. These connections disrupt the frameworks that prevail in art criticism and museum curation: of Chinese contemporary art as brand new and nation-bound and of global feminist art as born in the West before spreading to the rest. They work to unhinge woman from the literal and figurative work she has performed for the nation in modern and contemporary art. Feminist art thus emerges as an epistemological field of practice rather than an object, event, or project, in which thinking relationally, in terms of social hierarchies, aesthetic form, and ideology, is foundational.[54] Feminist art, rather than originating in a particular time or place, has the potential to world in another way, to make visible other worlds-in-becoming. It creates new sight lines of knowledge, recognition, affiliation, and alliance in which art takes on an ethical dimension, of reordering the pain and pleasure of being in the world, of memorializing, of taking care.

在田野调查过程中，我认识了像尹秀珍这样获得国际认可与流通的女性艺术家，但在“女性主义视线”中，我着重书写三位职业生涯轨迹不那么显眼的艺术家——李天翩、何成瑶和雷燕。我把她

们的作品解释为女性主义作品，是因为她们处于边缘所培养出的批判性历史编纂意识。与这些艺术家的相遇、她们的故事及作品，改变了我对女性主义艺术的理解。她们使跨国和跨历史的连接变得可见。这些连接扰乱了艺术批评和博物馆策展中盛行的框架：中国当代艺术是全新的且受民族束缚，全球女性主义艺术诞生于西方再传播到其他地区。她们努力把女性从她在现代和当代艺术中为国家所承担的实际的和象征性的工作中松脱出来。女性主义艺术由此浮现为一个认识论上的实践场域，而非一个对象、事件或项目；在其中，关系性思考——就社会等级、审美形式和意识形态而言——是基础性的。[54] 女性主义艺术并非起源于某一特定时间或地点，而是具有以另一种方式营造世界的潜能，使其他正在生成的世界变得可见。它创造知识、承认、归属和联盟的新视线，艺术在其中承担伦理维度：重新安排在世间的痛苦与愉悦、纪念与照料。

Using Chela Sandoval's concept of differential oppositional consciousness, I argue that these artists' peripheral positions shaped the development of a critical art practice. They not only deconstruct the ideological power of past forms of image making but also meta-ideologize, or create "new, 'higher' levels of signification built onto the older, dominant forms of ideology in a radical process."[55] They take, for instance, Maoist representations of the woman soldier, so prevalent in literature, art, and film, and recast her in ways that question the instrumental use of her image by the state and redirect her critical potential toward different aims. Meta-ideologizing is an emancipatory technology of oppositional power that "moves in, through, and then outside of dominant ideology."[56] As art practice, it reveals the long-durée global art world encounters that have shaped different worldings, or visions of the world, and the dependence of these worldings on particular understandings of gender.

借助切拉·桑多瓦尔“差异对立意识”的概念，我认为这些艺术家的边缘位置塑造了一种批判性艺术实践的发展。她们不仅解构过去图像制作形式的意识形态权力，还进行元意识形态化，即创造“新的、‘更高’的意指层次，以激进的过程加建于旧的、主导性的意识形态形式之上。”[55] 例如，她们采用文学、艺术和电影中如此普遍的毛泽东主义女兵形象，并重新铸造她，以质疑国家对她形象的利用，并把她的批判潜能转向不同目标。元意识形态化是一种解放性的对立权力技术，它“进入、穿过，然后走出主导意识形态。”[56] 作为艺术实践，它揭示塑造不同世界营造（或世界图景）的长期全球艺术界相遇，以及这些世界营造对特定性别理解的依赖。

Put another way, these women are “caught up” in a different way from male peers who moved from underground, “avant-garde” activity to positions of national and international influence. They are caught by a set of interlocking double binds, generated through cultural encounter over time, regarding female talent and representation. For example, traditional women of talent (cainü), cast as poetic and prone to flights of fancy, were seen as lacking the rationality to become disciplined national subjects, the “good wife and wise mother” or “mother of citizens” articulated by early twentieth-century reformers, whereas traditional virtuous women were seen as lacking the cultural literacy and education to likewise serve the new nation.[57] By the end of the twentieth century, the catch had become: women who “hold up half the sky” lack individual consciousness and innovation as artists, whereas women who identify with nüxing yishu, constrained by subjective interiority, lack public political consciousness. The double bind, conceived as a communication dilemma that results from two conflicting messages, sets a trap that ends in failure no matter what message one follows.[58] The resulting confusion sustained through habitual experience with this splintering form of negative injunction serves as a form of control without overt coercion.[59] Art can be a way of meditating on and moving beyond the dilemma, a method for confronting this form of control. The artists I focus on in part III create works that activate image worlds; their excavation and reworking of past images and ways of image making are multidirectional and meta-ideological. They cite across space and time, not as attribution or homage, but to shift our understanding of the world-making power of images past and future. The depth of their conceptual practice, while not usually recognized for this achievement, opens up interpretation of work by their male counterparts in terms other than those of a universalizing story of artistic expression.

换言之，这些女性被“困住”的方式，不同于那些从地下“前卫”活动走向国家和国际影响力位置的男性同行。她们被一组相互锁扣的双重束缚所困，这些束缚在长期文化相遇中围绕女性才能和再现而生成。例如，传统才女（cainü）被塑造成诗意、耽于幻想的形象，被视为缺乏成为有纪律的国家主体所需的理性——这些主体包括 20 世纪初改革者所阐述的“贤妻良母”或“国民之母”——而传统贤德女性则被视为缺乏文化素养和教育，无法同样服务于新国家。[57] 到 20 世纪末，困境变成：“顶起半边天”的女性缺乏作为艺术家的个体意识和创新；而认同“女性艺术”的女性受限于主观内在性，缺乏公共政治意识。双重束缚被设想为由两条冲突信息造成的沟通困境，无论遵循哪条信息，最终都落入失败的陷阱。[58] 由此产生的困惑通过这种分裂式负面禁令的习惯性经验得以维持，成为一种没有公开强制的控制形式。[59] 艺术可以成为沉思并超越这一困境的方式，一种直面这种控制的方法。我在第三部分聚焦的艺术家创作激活图像世界的作品；她们对过去图像和图像制作方式的挖掘与再加工是多向的、元意识形态的。她们跨越空间和时间引用，不是为了标明来源或致敬，而是为了改变我们对过去和未来图像之世界营造力量的理解。她们概念实践的深度——尽管通常未因这一成就而被承认——打开了以不同于普遍化艺术表达叙事的方式来解释其男性同行作品的可能。

The concept of the "image world," central to my critical praxis, emerged from my encounters with these artists and their work. Image worlds highlight the relationships among images, in which the form and meaning of one is shaped by others, within a complex network invoked in the process of looking and making. Any single historicist line of influence and attribution thus ruptures into a web of meaning in which past works are not hermetically sealed but open to resignification from multiple directions. Image worlds also show how particular understandings of the world are made visible by the image and how images are works that draw on and remake a world of other images.[60] Image worlds take, in the words of Rasheed Araeen, "art as method." It is art, as he writes, "by which modernity as an advancing force is defined by its exclusive European subjectivity; only art can confront neo-imperialism and offer a model of decolonialism."[61] To think in terms of image worlds is to visualize the multidirectional tensions between colonial and decolonial forces (East-West and male-female) that shape the work of art enmeshed in a global network of power relations.

"图像世界"概念是我的批判实践的核心，它源于我与这些艺术家及其作品的相遇。图像世界突显图像之间的关系：在观看和创作过程中唤起的复杂网络里，一幅图像的形式与意义由其他图像塑造。因此，任何单一历史主义的影响与归属线索都会断裂成意义之网，过去作品在其中并非密闭，而是向着来自多个方向的再意义化敞开。图像世界也显示，对世界的特定理解如何通过图像变得可见，以及图像如何是汲取并重造其他图像世界的作品。[60] 用拉希德·阿瑞恩的话说，图像世界"把艺术作为方法"。他写道，正是通过艺术，"现代性作为一种推进力量，由其排他性的欧洲主体性所定义；只有艺术能够直面新帝国主义，并提供去殖民化的范式。"[61] 以图像世界来思考，就是把塑造艺术作品的殖民与去殖民力量（东西方、男性—女性）之间的多向张力可视化——这些艺术作品交织于全球权力关系网络之中。

The work of art, in "setting up a world," emerges in my fieldwork zone of encounter from tensions between different stagings of the world, or "worldings."[62] Worldings have the aura of totality, yet the continual supplanting of one by another or the coexistence of radically different visions shatters any such sureness. A geneology of worlding as theoretical concept, followed by a tracing of several worldings that continually resurface in the palimpsest of Chinese contemporary art, sets the stage for my ethnographic argument that begins with part I: Art Worldings. These selected worldings gesture toward the expansive archive of images, and the webs of meaning in which they are implicated, that artists pull from as they develop their repertoire and potential to differentially remake the world.[63] The ways these worldings overlap with or haunt one another are foundational to the contradictions arising in the field of Chinese contemporary art.

代艺术场域中矛盾的根基。

Hong Hao's Selected Scriptures, a series of silk-screen prints that resemble classical maps of exploration and discovery, presents interleaved, conflicting worldings. Each print's map appears to be contained within a traditionally bound book, opened to a particular page. This fictitious atlas binds together, however, not the world's nations, but differently imagined organizations of world space. Its maps scramble the world in any number of ways: by redrawing borders, shuffling place names, or altering the shape of geographic landmasses. In some, legends are labeled "Corrections." Dotted-line routes of ancient seafaring vessels and modern fighter jets connote crisscrossing trade and military connections. For New World Order I, Hong identified nations with the names of large corporations. New Topography assigns vast tracts of land to First World countries and crowds the Third World within severely delimited boundaries. In New Political World (figure Intro.03), First and Third Worlds are reversed. The shape of the United States is shaded yellow and labeled the People's Republic of China. A pink landmass sprouting the head, legs, and tail of a fox, labeled Mozambique, replaces Europe. The reiteration of "new" suggests a continual displacement of one world by another, although they all appear within the covers of a single book.

洪浩的《选集》系列丝网版画模仿古典探险与发现地图，呈现交错、冲突的世界营造。每幅版画中的地图似乎都被装在一本传统线装书里，翻到某一页。然而，这本虚构的地图集绑在一起的不是世界上各个国家，而是对世界空间的不同想象组织。它的地图以各种方式打乱世界：重画边界、打乱地名，或改变地理陆块的形状。有些地图的图例标着“更正”。古代航海帆船和现代战斗机的虚线航线，暗示着纵横交错的贸易与军事连接。在《新世界秩序 I》中，洪浩用大公司的名字标识国家。《新地形学》把广阔土地分给第一世界国家，把第三世界挤进严格限定的边界。在《新政治世界》（导论图 03）中，第一世界和第三世界颠倒过来。美国的形状被涂成黄色，标为中华人民共和国。一块粉色陆块长出狐狸的头、腿和尾巴，标为莫桑比克，取代了欧洲。“新”一词的反复出现暗示一个世界不断取代另一个世界，尽管它们都容纳在同一本书的封面与封底之间。

Gayatri Spivak invokes the term worlding in her critique of imperialism and the role of literature as a crucial form of cultural representation in underwriting the imperialist project. She characterizes her notion of the "worlding of a world" as a vulgarization of Martin Heidegger's philosophical idea of a world in relation to the earth, which shelters in its uninscribed spontaneity.[64] The world, as I understand Heidegger's formulation, is the human abstraction of what happens on earth, an ideological construct that makes material social relations seem natural, of the earth. Through her postcolonial reading of Heidegger, Spivak describes a worlding as the implicit, naturalized script that suffuses the literature of European colonizing cultures in the creation of something that has come to be called "the Third World," a narrative that organizes the world according to chronological, developmental stages. In this narrative, the colonized are robbed of the power to world, to represent their relationship to the earth. Spivak continues, "To consider the Third World as distant cultures, exploited but with rich intact literary heritages waiting to be recovered, interpreted, and curricularized in English translation fosters the emergence of 'the Third World' as a signifier that allows us to forget that 'worlding,' even as it expands the empire of the literary discipline."[65] The colonized are hence consigned to the earth that shelters the colonizer worlding. The work of deconstruction becomes necessary to unforget or reveal this powerful process of concealment, in which the world of the historical people of the Third World, and especially the native woman, has been repressed.

佳亚特里 • 斯皮瓦克在批判帝国主义以及文学作为文化再现关键形式在支撑帝国主义工程中的作用时，援引了 " 世界营造 " 一词。她将自己 " 一个世界的世界营造 " 的观念，描述为对马丁 • 海德格尔关于世界与大地之关系的哲学观念的粗俗化——大地庇护于其未被书写的自发状态中。[64] 据我对海德格尔表述的理解，世界是对大地上所发生之事的人类抽象，是一种意识形态建构，使物质社会关系显得自然，仿佛属于大地。通过她对海德格尔的后殖民阅读，斯皮瓦克把世界营造描述为一种隐含的、自然化的脚本，渗透在欧洲殖民文化文学之中，创造了后来被称为 " 第三世界 " 的东西——一种按年代和发展阶段组织世界的叙事。在这种叙事中，被殖民者被剥夺了营造世界的能力，即再现他们与大地关系的能力。斯皮瓦克继续说：" 把第三世界视为遥远的文化，受剥削却拥有丰富完整的文学遗产，等待在英译中被恢复、解释和课程化，会促成 ' 第三世界 ' 作为一个能指的出现，使我们忘记 ' 世界营造 '，即使它扩展了文学学科的帝国。"[65] 被殖民者因此被放逐到庇护殖民者世界营造的大地之上。解构工作因此成为必要，以 " 不忘却 " 或揭示这一强大的遮蔽过程——第三世界处于具体历史中的人民、尤其是本土女性的世界在其中被压抑。

This worlding persists in some of the ways Chinese art has been managed in Western art spaces, but is also disrupted by other worldings—those advanced by China's successive modernity projects, each of which required a rupture from the immediate past. Rebecca Karl's work, for example, on early Chinese nationalists demonstrates how they confronted Euro-American and Japanese imperialisms that had inscribed China as part of the Third World. They resisted through alternative ways of "staging the world"—tracing connections with political movements such as the Philippine revolution against the United States—in order to nurture an anticolonial consciousness.[66]

Gendered Worldings

性别化的世界营造

来源位置：31

Extending the idea developed by these thinkers, I conclude this chapter with three worldings—semicolonial, anticolonial, and late socialist. Each is made visible through images and structured by gender. Taken together they provide a framework for placing Chinese contemporary art in the expanded field. The first of these, a semicolonial worlding, is characterized by a term used to signify that China was not colonized outright by a single power, but subject to multiple Euro-American and Japanese imperialisms.[67] Chinese contemporary artists' uneasy relationship with the West emerges from a frequently invoked national memory of colonial humiliation.[68] As brass plaques at tourist sites in Beijing remind visitors, Western powers at the end of the nineteenth century and early twentieth century looted China's imperial treasures.

延伸这些思想家的观念，我以三种世界营造结束本章——半殖民的、反殖民的和晚期社会主义的。每一种都通过图像变得可见，并由性别结构。合在一起，它们为把中国当代艺术置于扩展场域中提供了框架。第一种是半殖民地世界营造，其特征可用一个术语表示：中国并未被单一列强彻底殖民，而是受制于多个欧美及日本的帝国主义。[67] 中国当代艺术家与西方的不安关系，源于常被援引的民族殖民屈辱记忆。[68] 正如北京景点里的铜牌提醒游客，西方列强在 19 世纪末 20 世纪初掠夺了中国的皇家珍宝。

In "Looting Beijing: 1860, 1900," James Hevia argues that the 1860 moment of Opium War plunder created new markets and knowledge of Chinese objets d'art, firmly situating things Chinese "within a global discourse on the curiosities of non-European peoples, and as commodities, the common sense of capitalist market exchange."[69] In the forty-year interim between 1860 and subsequent looting in 1900 when an eight-nation foreign alliance crushed the peasant uprising of the Boxer Rebellion, systematized practices of discernment grew in sophistication as auctioned objects passed into European and American markets.[70] Foreign art dealers opened shop in Beijing, and Western connoisseurs published tracts on Chinese art detailing classification schemes that guided the cataloging of items in institutions like London's Victoria and Albert Museum and New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art.[71] These developments occurred simultaneously with the birth of modern exhibition spaces funded by the nation-state: the public museum and international exposition.

在《掠夺北京：1860，1900》一文中，何伟亚（James Hevia）认为，1860 年鸦片战争掠夺时刻创造了新的中国艺术品市场和知识，把中国物品牢牢置于“关于非欧洲民族珍奇之物的全球话语中，并作为商品，置于资本主义市场交换的常识中。”[69] 在 1860 年至 1900 年八国联军镇压义和团农民起义的后续掠夺之间的四十年里，随着拍卖物品进入欧美市场，系统化的鉴赏实践日益精致。[70] 外国艺术商在北京开店，西方鉴赏家出版关于中国艺术的小册子，详述分类体系，指导伦敦维多利亚与艾尔伯特博物馆和纽约大都会艺术博物馆等机构的藏品编目。[71] 这些发展同时发生于由民族国家资助的现代展览空间的诞生：公共博物馆和国际博览会。

In an essay on British institutional framings of Chinese art, Craig Clunas admits to a moment of boyhood fetishism. His father took him, at the age of fourteen, to visit the Victoria and Albert Museum. Enthralled in the "Far Eastern Room" by a carved lacquer throne of the Chinese Emperor Qianlong (figure Intro.04), he waited for the guard to look away, then knelt before it. Decades later, after he has become curator of the same China collection, he unpacks the historical processes by which British public museums transferred Chinese objects from the domain of ethnography to that of "Chinese art," in a containment of Chinese culture as something with "a glorious past, a decayed and exhausted present and no future," a stage inviting theatricality.[72]

在一篇关于英国机构如何框定中国艺术的文章中，柯律格（Craig Clunas）承认自己少年时代有一段恋物癖时刻。他十四岁时，父亲带他参观维多利亚与艾尔伯特博物馆。他在“远东厅”被中国乾隆皇帝的雕漆宝座（导论图 04）迷住，等警卫不注意时，在宝座前跪了下来。几十年后，他成为同一中国收藏的策展人，剖析英国公共博物馆把中国物品从民族志领域转移到“中国艺术”领域的历史过程：把中国文化收容为某种“有着辉煌过去、衰败枯竭的现在和没有未来”的东西，一个邀人上演戏剧性的舞台。[72]

Within this display of China as an exhausted "lost state," the traditional Chinese woman came to stand as symbol of its decadent decay, and for Chinese reformers, of what they had to overcome to build a healthy, modern nation. As plundered Chinese objects entered Western collections, so did typifying postcards such as "Canton: Chinese Small Feet Beauty" (figure Intro.05) and "Chine: Chinoise à petit pied" (figure Intro.06).[73] These images were reprinted in a 2001 Beijing Youth News article. The first hand-colored studio photograph stages the woman with her silk-clad bound feet as one among several assembled Oriental objects. In the second photograph, captured in documentary black and white, the woman holds up her bare foot to the camera, exposing its bent shape to a voyeuristic, ethnographic gaze.[74] The newspaper article, "Deformity beneath a Glorious Costume," introduces a book of postcards produced during the late Qing Dynasty, explaining that these foreign representations of China will give contemporary youth a sense of their civilization's past "profound grief and bitterness."[75] Vanquished China became equated with exotic images exposing how Chinese culture had deformed its women.

在这种把中国展示为一个枯竭的“失落国家”的陈列中，传统中国女性成为其腐朽衰败的象征；对中国改革者而言，也是他们为建立健康现代国家所必须克服之物的象征。随着被掠夺的中国物品进入西方收藏，典型化的明信片也进入其中，如《广州：中国小脚美人》（导论图 05）和《中国：小脚中国女人》（导论图 06）。[73] 这些图像被重印在 2001 年《北京青年报》的一篇文章中。第一张手工上色的影楼照片把缠足裹着丝绸的女子摆置为一组东方物件中的一件。第二张照片以纪实黑白拍摄，女子向镜头抬起赤裸的脚，把弯曲的形状暴露给窥视性的民族志凝视。[74] 报纸文章《华丽衣装下的畸形》介绍一本清末明信片集，解释说这些外国对中国的再现将让当代青年感受到其文明过去的“深切悲痛与苦涩”。[75] 被征服的中国被等同于那些暴露中国文化如何戕害其女性的异域图像。

In China’s treaty ports, where multiple foreign powers exerted economic and political control, reform-minded intellectuals sought to explain and change their world situation. As Tani Barlow details, they turned to internationally circulating evolutionary discourse informed by the male/female binary of Victorian anthropological sex theory.[76] They interpreted Chinese tradition as having unnaturally oppressed woman, thereby making China weak, and forged the idea of a new eroticized woman, nüxing, based on a theory that prioritized sexual difference and desire over Confucian protocols concerning the position of a kinswoman in the patriline. They believed that liberating women for sexual selection, to choose their own reproductive partners, would eugenically strengthen the Chinese people.

在通商口岸，多个外国列强施加经济和政治控制，改革派知识分子试图解释并改变自己的世界处境。正如白露（Tani Barlow）详细论述的，他们转向当时国际流通的进化论话语，这种话语受维多利亚人类学性别理论中男女二元论的影响。[76] 他们解释中国传统的做法不自然地压迫了女性，从而使中国衰弱，并根据一种把性别差异与欲望置于儒家女性亲属父系位置礼法之上的理论，锻造了新的情欲化“女性”（nüxing）观念。他们相信，解放女性以进行性选择、选择自己的生育伴侣，将以优生方式增强中华民族。

Chinese progressive feminism and nüxing, a neologism made up of the ideographs for “female” and “sex,” emerged from the drive to form a modern nation that could stand up to colonialism. (A forward-looking term at the time of its coining, nüxing has since undergone a complex history of repeated disavowal and reclamation.) This Chinese conjunction of nation building and female liberation produced women as signifiers of modernity. This semicolonial worlding led Chinese nationalists at the turn of the century and later Marxist critics in the 1920s and 1930s to reimagine the globe through an anticolonial worlding. In contradistinction to the racialized hierarchy of more or less civilized or advanced cultures promoted by imperialist visions of the world, they drew a distinction between those who used cultural difference in order to legitimate violent colonial oppression and those who through historical consciousness struggled for revolutionary self-actualization. Chinese socialist art thus images an international axis in which the people of Asia, Africa, and Latin America stand in solidarity with Mao at the center. As Julia Andrews points out, the painting Mao Zedong with the People of Asia, Africa, and Latin America (figure Intro.07) by Jin Shangyi and Wu Biduan contains yet another historical layer of political realignment.[77] Both painters were influenced by Soviet socialist realism; Jin was a graduate of an important oil painting class taught in China by Soviet painter Konstantin Maksimov, and Wu had studied in Leningrad. They most likely drew on A. A. Myl’nikov’s Awakening, exhibited in China in 1957, which depicts the people of Africa, the Middle East, and the Americas marching together with raised fists. As the rift between China and the Soviet Union widened in the late 1950s, leading to an official split in 1960, Jin and Wu represented China at the global center of orthodox Communism.

中国进步女性主义与“女性”（nüxing）——一个由“女”与“性”两个汉字构成的新词——从建立一个能够抵抗殖民主义的现代民族国家的驱力中产生。（“女性”在创造之时是一个前瞻性的术语，

此后经历了反复被否弃与收回的复杂历史。）这种国家建设与女性解放的中国式结合，把女性生产为现代性的能指。这种半殖民地世界营造，引导世纪之交的中国民族主义者和后来的 20 世纪 20、30 年代马克思主义批评家，通过一种反殖民世界营造重新想象全球。与帝国主义世界图景所推动的、按文明程度或先进程度划分的种族化等级不同，他们区分了两种人：一种利用文化差异为暴力殖民压迫辩护，另一种通过历史意识为革命的自我实现而斗争。中国社会主义艺术因此描绘了一条国际轴线：亚洲、非洲和拉丁美洲的人民与毛泽东团结在中心。正如安雅兰（Julia Andrews）指出，靳尚谊与吴必端合作的《毛泽东与亚非拉人民》（导论图 07）还包含另一层历史性的政治重组。[77] 两位画家都受苏联社会主义现实主义影响；靳尚谊毕业于苏联画家康斯坦丁 • 马克西莫夫在中国开办的重要油画班，吴必端则曾在列宁格勒学习。他们很可能借鉴了 A. A. 米利尼科夫的《觉醒》——1957 年曾在中国展出，描绘非洲、中东和美洲人民举拳同行。随着 20 世纪 50 年代末中苏裂痕扩大，并于 1960 年正式分裂，靳尚谊和吴必端把中国置于正统共产主义的全球中心。

This anticolonial worlding depended on a new conception of woman, as the nüxing of treaty-port reform discourse came to represent woman as bourgeois, desiring, and self-obsessed. Chinese Communist thinkers theorized a national revolutionary female subject; and funü—signifiying a massified subject to be mobilized for state political movements including class revolution—superseded the eroticized nüxing.[78] While class consciousness now eclipsed that of gender, the question of woman remained front and center in official ideology with the goal of proving a Marxist tenet fundamental to Maoist gender discourse, that "the degree of woman's emancipation is the natural measure of the general emancipation."[79] Socialist realism depicted women "holding up half the sky," in paintings such as Pan Jiajun's 1972 I Am a "Seagull"(figure Intro.08). Iron girls repaired high-voltage wires, welded girders, operated heavy machinery, shouldered guns, and harvested crops, dressed in the same clothes as men and performing the same tasks. They appeared again and again, "red, bright, and shining" (hong guang liang) with their gazes trained upward and outward, as official art pedagogy instructed. They became a fixture of visual culture, even as the number of prominent female artists during the height of socialism paled in comparison with their pictorial multiplicity and arguably even shrank from their ranks in early twentieth-century art circles when bourgeois women's art education flourished in cities like Shanghai.[80]

Throughout the Cold War, Western museums limited their display of Chinese art to the antiquities of its lost empire, with the visual arts under Mao held at bay as political propaganda.[81] In the United States, abstract expressionism became the epitome of Western modern art's will to freedom, its ideological promotion of abstraction, coded as more advanced in the language of formal innovation, over the political avant-garde.[82] While the artists I met during my fieldwork had trained in the visual styles and iconography of a revolutionary socialist worlding, their movement into a global art market forced them to confront late socialist

"linked-up-with-the world" worldings. China's integration with transnational capitalism reconfigured its global imaginary to one shaped not through alliance with Third World comrades but by connections with Asia and Oumei (Europe and America). This shift in visualizing the world comes into focus in a work like Wang Qingsong's Forum (figure Intro.09). In this 2001 photograph, one in a series of staged, performative self-portraits, the artist appears as a modern-day Chinese bureaucrat sitting before a battery of microphones and photographers. The sign behind him announces, in Chinese and English, a fictitious "International Forum on Reestablishing Contemporary Civilization in China." The logos on the sign for the event's corporate sponsors range from Japan's jvc to the yellow arches of McDonald's; the microphones are marked with insignia for medial channels such as bbc, cnn, cctv, and Fox News, as well as national flags representing Canada, South Korea, and various European nations. The audience the artist addresses, with self-mocking seriousness, is clearly a capitalist West with links to the developmentalist economies of East Asia.

在整个冷战期间，西方博物馆对中国艺术的展示局限于其失落帝国的古物，毛泽东治下的视觉艺术被作为政治宣传拒之门外。[81] 在美国，抽象表现主义成为西方现代艺术追求自由的意志的典范，其在意识形态上推崇抽象——在形式创新的语言中被编码为更先进——压过了政治前卫。[82] 虽然我在田野调查中遇到的艺术家受训于革命社会主义世界营造的视觉风格和图像志，但他们进入全球艺术市场的过程迫使他们面对晚期社会主义"与世界接轨"的世界营造。中国与跨国资本主义的整合，把其全球想象重新配置为一种不再通过与第三世界同志结盟、而是通过同亚洲及欧美（Oumei）的连接来塑造的想象。这种世界观的变化在像王庆松的《论坛》（导论图 09）这样的作品中显现。在这幅 2001 年的照片中——一组摆拍的表演性自画像之一——艺术家以现代中国官僚的形象出现，坐在一排麦克风和摄影师前。他身后的标牌用中英文宣布一个虚构的"重塑中国当代文明的国际论坛"。标牌上的企业赞助商标志从日本 JVC 到麦当劳的黄色拱门；麦克风上标有 BBC、CNN、CCTV 和福克斯新闻等媒体的标志，以及代表加拿大、韩国和多个欧洲国家的国旗。艺术家以自嘲的严肃态度所面对的听众，显然是与东亚发展主义经济体有联系的资本主义西方。

Female contemporaries Cao Fei and Huang Yin examine the commercialized and gendered aspects of this new worlding by adorning the female body with the cosmopolitan fashions of Burberry's trademark plaid and Louis Vuitton's signature bag, markers of luxury precisely because their manufacturers claim the genuine articles are not made in China, although knock-off copies and many other Western name brands are produced by Chinese female factory labor. In Cao's video Rabid Dogs (figure Intro.10), actors in Beijing opera-style makeup perform a parody of the city's new class of office workers as groveling "rabid dogs." Huang's oil painting Myth (figure Intro.11) reproduces the sleek surfaces of commercial photography, only the model's head turned coyly toward the viewer is that of a cartoonish smiling dog. They conflate the female body not only with the fashion markers of conspicuous consumption but with a commodity item signifying urbane wealth and leisure in China, the pet dog.

同代女性艺术家曹斐和黄引审视这一新世界营造的商业化和性别化方面：她们用博柏利（Burberry）标志性格纹和路易威登（Louis Vuitton）标志性手袋等世界主义时尚装饰女性身体——这些奢侈品标志之所以成立，恰恰因为制造商声称正品并非中国制造，尽管仿冒品和许多其他西方名牌实际上由中国女工生产。在曹斐的录像《疯狗》（导论图 10）中，涂着京剧式妆容的演员戏仿这座城市的新白领阶层，把他们演成卑躬屈膝的"疯狗"。黄引的油画《神话》（导论图 11）复制商业摄影的光滑表面，只是模特的头变成一只卡通式微笑的狗，腼腆地转向观众。她们把女性身体不仅与炫耀性消费的时尚标志混同，也与一种象征都市财富和闲暇的商品混同——宠物狗。

In these images, which work through China's bid to "link tracks with the world," there lurks a suspicion of how Chinese accumulation of symbolic and cultural capital will translate into social capital in the eyes of the "world," as well as of the repressions entailed in these dressed-up embodiments of "contemporary civilization." The reverse anthropomorphism in Rabid Dogs and Myth resonates with the oft-repeated story of the colonial park in Shanghai with a sign forbidding the entrance of both Chinese and dogs. Cao's artist statement for her video exudes resignation and indignation: "We are surely poor dogs, willing to act as animals and locked in the cage of modernization. When will we have the courage to bite our bosses ruthlessly, taking off our masks, peeling off our fur, and becoming a group of real rabid dogs?"[83]

在这些围绕中国“与世界接轨”的努力而运作的图像中，潜藏着一种疑虑：中国积累的象征资本和文化资本，在“世界”眼中将如何转化为社会资本；以及这些盛装打扮的“当代文明”化身所包含的压抑。《疯狗》和《神话》中的反向拟人，与一个反复讲述的故事相呼应：上海某座殖民公园的牌子禁止中国人和狗入内。曹斐关于录像的艺术家陈述流露出无奈与愤慨：“我们当然是可怜的狗，甘愿做动物，被锁在现代化的笼子里。什么时候我们才有勇气狠狠地咬老板，摘下面具，剥下皮毛，成为一群真正的疯狗？”[83]

The pieces by Cao and Huang also articulate with the resurgence of woman as nüxing in what Tani Barlow labels market feminism and traces through Chinese thinkers like Li Xiaojiang.[84] In the 1980s, Li led a critique of revolutionary modernity that sought to "recover" woman from the funü subject represented by state organizations. When Deng-era Marxist humanist philosophers critiqued the destruction of individual agency under Mao, Li identified the human subject they aimed to recuperate as male. In response, she theorized a female subject whose dehumanization had taken place most trenchantly at the level of the body and argued that Maoist culture had obliterated natural sex difference and denaturalized women's bodies by requiring conformity to a male standard. Li posited instead an essential woman, whose creative powers lay in her physiological difference and could be realized through the pleasures of reproduction and domestic consumption.[85] Her position gained popular currency, especially among a growing sector of quasi-middle-class women and influenced the rise of cultural formations like nüxing yishu. This move to recuperate feminine subjectivity, however, also raised questions like those posed by the artistic representation of grinning, groveling canine women about commodification and containment.

曹斐和黄引的作品也与“女性”的复兴相呼应——白露称之为“市场女性主义”，并通过李小江等中国思想家加以追溯。[84] 20 世纪 80 年代，李小江领导了对革命现代性的批判，试图从国家组织所代表的“妇女”主体中“找回”女人。当邓时代的马克思主义人道主义哲学家批判毛泽东时代对个体能动性的摧毁时，李小江指出，他们试图恢复的人类主体是男性。作为回应，她理论化了一个女性主体，其去人性化最尖锐地发生在身体层面；她认为毛泽东主义文化消灭了自然的性别差异，通过要求女性身体服从男性标准而使其去自然化。李小江转而提出一种本质主义的女人，其创造力在于生理差异，并可通过生育和家庭消费的愉悦来实现。[85] 她的立场获得了广泛欢迎，尤其是在日益壮大的准中产阶级女性中，并影响了“女性艺术”等文化形态的兴起。然而，这种恢复女性主体性的转向，也提出了像那些咧嘴、匍匐的犬女艺术形象所引发的关于商品化和收容的问题。

In her essay “A Scene in the Fog,” feminist cultural critic Dai Jinhua describes 1990s Chinese culture as a “city of mirrors.” She writes, “Contemporary Chinese culture resembles a scene in the fog, transfixed between orientalism and occidentalism, interpellated by different, diametrically opposed power centers, existing in a proliferating, multiple, overlapping cultural space. The light optimistic boat is destined to be overloaded with the heritages of premodernity, modernity, Cold War-era and eighties culture.”[86] With this “light optimistic boat” metaphorically evoking a dream vision of China achieving global parity through the ferrying of its culture into the world, Dai reads from the surface the swelling currents that pull and batter the craft. Experimental Beijing follows the historical moment of Dai’s description, as the scene explodes with the millennial fervor of Olympic fireworks, which trail into dust and smoke in the aftermath. It examines the new cultural monuments to China’s global future that appeared on the horizon, even as other visions of being in the world glimmered at their powerful edges. It asks what can be gleaned from the ephemeral experiments that flash up from the shadows of history—those excavations of ruins always proximate to the construction site, those inventories of traces that deconstruct and remake from the rubble. As Beijing turned itself over to “enter the world,” the work of art collaborated with and subverted this new Chinese Dream. Wang Nengtao’s Subversion–Earth documents this worlding, as well as the uninscribed spontaneity of the earth, the possibility of subversion by those on the ground. Yin Xiuzhen’s Portable Beijing shuttles through the world while simultaneously giving shelter to an intimate, tactile history of other forms of social organization and connection. Chen Lingyang’s 25:00 glows with the magic hour fantasy of inhabiting the “real/male” world on one’s own terms. To place Chinese contemporary art in the expanded field, in “a proliferating, multiple, overlapping cultural space,” requires a double vision that holds monumental and ephemeral together.

在《雾中风景》一文中，女性主义文化批评家戴锦华把 20 世纪 90 年代中国文化描述为一座“镜城”。她写道：“当代中国文化像一处雾中风景，停驻在东方主义与西方主义之间，被不同的、截然相反的权力中心所质询，存在于一个不断增殖、多重、重叠的文化空间里。那只轻便乐观的小舟，注定要超载前现代、现代、冷战时代和八十年代文化的遗产。”[86] 这只“轻快乐观的小舟”隐喻性地唤起一种梦想景象：中国通过把自身文化摆渡到世界而实现与世界平起平坐；戴锦华从表面读出牵拉、拍打这艘小舟的汹涌潮流。《实验北京》追随戴锦华所描述的历史时刻：场景随着奥运焰火的千禧年狂热而爆炸，焰火在余波中化为尘土与烟雾。它考察出现在地平线上的中国全球未来的新文化纪念碑，即使其他在世方式在这些强力的边缘闪烁微光。它追问能从历史阴影中闪现的短暂实验中拾取什么——那些总是临近工地的废墟挖掘，那些从瓦砾中解构并重造的痕迹清单。当北京转向“进入世界”时，艺术作品与这一新中国梦既合作又颠覆。王能涛的《颠覆——土地》记录了这种世界营造，也记录了大地上未被书写的自发状态，以及被地面上的人颠覆的可能性。尹秀珍的《便携北京》在世界中穿梭，同时庇护着其他社会组织与连接形式的亲密、可触历史。陈羚羊的《25:00》闪耀着魔幻时刻的幻想：按自己的方式栖居“真实/男性”世界。把中国当代艺术置于扩展场域中，置于“一个不断增殖、多重、重叠的文化空间中”，需要一种双重视线，同时把握纪念碑式与转瞬即逝之物。

China was first invited to participate in the Venice Biennale in 1980, but officials either unfamiliar with Western conceptions of contemporary art or bent on espousing a socialist message of art by "the people" sent folk art such as papercuts and tapestries. Francesca Dal Lago, who has detailed this history in "Papercuts, Colorful Pictures and Mountains of Shit," also served as consultant to curator Achille Bonito Oliva for the 1993 Biennale exhibit Passaggio a Oriente (Passage to the East), which included Chinese and Japanese artists. I draw here on Claypool's "Metadomesticity," in which she argues that Yin offers a hopeful counterpoint to sociologist Marc Augé's bleak definition of supermodernity: "What I am calling 'metadomesticity' can be conceived in entirely negative terms—we might see it as one aspect of the supermodern world's threatening tracts of dehumanized modular non-places—but through Yin's visual work we can glimpse how it also possesses the potential for reimagining the world, constructing a positive process by which the domestic infiltrates those negative non-places, those gaping 'black holes,' reinvesting them with human meaning." 20. The Chinese term liumang consists of two characters, liu meaning "to flow" and mang referring to "common people." It connotes an "outsider" identity, someone who has fallen out of family, group, or state relations and therefore is potentially subversive. In the Chinese translation of the Communist Manifesto, the German term lumpenproletariat became liumang wuchanzhe (hooligan proletariat). The criminalization of hooliganism—activities such as gang fights, sexual assault on women, and disruption of public order—was codified under a provision of China's 1979 Criminal Law and subsequently used to also police homosex between men. This historical anxiety about wide-ranging male activities outside of heteronormative kinship demonstrates the need for deconstruction of gendered masculine and feminine norms together. 20. 中文词" 流氓" 由两个字组成：" 流" 意为流动，" 氓" 指平民。它意味着一种" 局外人" 身份，即从家庭、群体或国家关系中脱落、因而具有潜在颠覆性的人。在《共产党宣言》的中译本里，德文词 lumpenproletariat 被译为" 流氓无产者"。将流氓行为——如帮派斗殴、对妇女的性侵犯、扰乱公共秩序等活动——入罪，被写入 1979 年《中华人民共和国刑法》的一项条款，后来又用于管制男性之间的性行为。这种对异性恋规范亲属关系之外广泛男性活动的历史焦虑表明，有必要把性别化的男性与女性规范放在一起解构。Dutton, Streetlife China, 62–74；Kang, "The Decriminalization and Depathologization of Homosexuality in China"。[返回]

23. Kraus critiques this "Godzilla model" framing of China's arts as unsatisfying "because it imagines a Chinese state that is both consistent and omnipotent, while the record shows a polity far more internally divided, erratic, and ineffectual. The Godzilla model is not much better when it comes to artists, whom it romanticizes as heroes and rebel-dissident" (The Party and the Arty in China, 143). He presents an alternative narrative of artists in a protracted struggle for professional status and security. In "Arrière-pensée on an Avant-Garde," Barmé cynically predicts that Chinese artists' response to this Western fetishization and market demand will lead to "a new avant-garde art-to-order: dissent on tap" (82). 40. Chinese artists of the contemporary era employ a wider array of media than those represented by this interpretation of dangdai yishu. Calligraphers and ink painters continue to practice these "traditional" and, according to some, more Chinese art forms in the current moment and so can be considered contemporary artists. However, with a few notable crossover exceptions such as Xu Bing and Gu Wenda, they tend to be labeled under categories such as "new ink painting" (xin shuimo hua) or "national painting" (guohua), understood to be more firmly rooted in China and its diasporas. Concerted effort goes into differentiating "contemporary" and "traditional" forms, even though artists often work in both. The phrase "contemporary Chinese art" risks emphasizing the Chinese-ness of the art, a distinction I am more interested in analyzing than reifying. [返回]

The postcard, produced by the Belgian company Nels, includes the following explanatory text: “The feet of young girls are compressed with cloth bands in order to obtain ‘small feet,’ which constitute one of the elements of Chinese female beauty.” In the full, original postcard (a cropped version appeared in the Beijing Youth News article), the photo of the woman is juxtaposed with one of a “Mendiant Chinois,” an elderly man dressed in rags leaning on a cane and holding out a begging bowl. This ethnographic depiction, as part of the popular production of postcards sent around the world, equates China’s traditional female practices with poverty and decay. Both postcards appear in Chen, Jiu meng zhong jing, 183–84. [返回]

The invitation for the now historic 1989 “no U-turn” exhibit in Beijing at the National Art Museum of China presents a translingual puzzle.[1] The Chinese text at the top reads Zhongguo xiandai yishu zhan (Chinese modern art exhibit). The English text at the bottom, China/Avant-Garde, anticipates a foreign audience. It also introduces a discrepancy that reveals the problem of translation when understood as a process of producing linguistic equivalencies.[2] What do we make of “modern” in Chinese versus “avant-garde” in English? Or of the French “avant-garde,” coined in the nineteenth century, in later Chinese and English contexts? Curator Gao Minglu explains that while xiandai (modern) in 1980s China signified newness, he and the editor of the exhibit catalogue agreed that “ ‘avant-garde’ made more sense than ‘modern’ as a translation of the original Chinese title.”[3] Modern in English seemed outdated, suggesting even a period style. Avant-garde sounded cutting-edge. Gao notes that Chinese artists and critics first began using qianwei (literally, forward guard) and xianfeng (literally, advance front) toward the end of the 1980s. It was only after 1989 that they gradually replaced “modern” as descriptors for contemporary art practice.[4]

1989 年那场如今已载入史册的北京中国美术馆 “ 禁止掉头 ” 展览，其邀请函呈现出一个跨语言的谜题。[1] 上方的中文写着 “ 中国现代艺术展 ”。下方的英文 “China/Avant-Garde” 则预示着一个外国观众群体。它还引入了一处差异，揭示出把翻译理解为生产语言对等物之过程时的问题。[2] 中文的 “ 现代 ” 与英文的 “ 前卫 ” 该如何理解？19 世纪创造的法文 “avant-garde”，在后来中文与英文语境中又意味着什么？策展人高名潞解释说，在 20 世纪 80 年代的中国，“ 现代 ”（xiandai）意味着新，但他和展览图录编辑一致认为，“ 用 ‘ 前卫 ’ 来翻译原中文标题比用 ‘ 现代 ’ 更说得通 ”。[3] 英文的 “modern” 显得过时，甚至暗示一种时期风格；前卫听起来则很前沿。高名潞指出，中国艺术家和批评家直到 20 世纪 80 年代末才开始使用 “ 前卫 ”（qianwei，原文释为 “ 前方卫队 ”）和 “ 先锋 ”（xianfeng，原文释为 “ 前进的锋线 ”）。也是在 1989 年之后，它们才逐渐取代 “ 现代 ”，成为当代艺术实践的描述词。[4]

As Chinese art circulated under the label xianfeng/avant-garde in the 1990s, I found myself struck, at street level, by a Chinese context for the term that diverged from its cultural career in the West. I regularly slid money through a subway ticket window under a brass plaque engraved with the characters gongren xianfeng hao (vanguard worker designation), a distinction awarded to units demonstrating an exemplary socialist work ethic. I noticed the honorary title on red and gold placards displayed in the front windows of public buses. I recognized its cognate of shaonian xianfeng dui (young pioneers) on elementary school banners and in the nationalist children's anthem whose lyrics impel young heirs of the Communist mantel to courageously advance toward victory. I noticed it in advertisements for electronics equipment, articles on home decorating, and public injunctions for Beijing to succeed in its bid for the Olympics, as well as on the cover of new art journals like Jinri xianfeng (Avant-garde today).[5] It was a term still in flux, with a past that lived on in present juxtaposition with new meanings.

20 世纪 90 年代，中国艺术以先锋/前卫（xianfeng/avant-garde）的标签流通时，我在街头层面被该词的中国语境所触动，它与这个词在西方经历的文化历程并不相同。我经常从地铁售票窗口递钱，窗口上方钉着一块铜牌，刻着“工人先锋号”（gongren xianfeng hao）——一种授予展现模范社会主义劳动伦理的单位的称号。我在公共汽车前窗的红金色标牌上注意到这一荣誉称号。我认出它的同源词“少年先锋队”（shaonian xianfeng dui）出现在小学横幅上，也出现在那首民族主义儿童歌曲里，歌词激励共产主义的年轻继承者勇敢向胜利前进。我在电子产品广告中注意到它，在关于家居装饰的文章中，在北京申奥成功的公共号召中，以及《今日先锋》这类新艺术杂志的封面上看到它。[5] 这是一个仍在变动的词，它的过去与新的含义并置，活在当下。

As a descriptor for the field I entered, xianfeng signifies the historical, political vanguard of Beijing as national capital and the forms of artistic activity it has fostered over time. It connotes revolutionary militarism and cultural cosmopolitanism. Only by assembling the translingual fragments of avant-garde/qianwei/xianfeng can we make sense of their cultural encounter in the context of Chinese contemporary art. Take for example the painting of a young woman in Red Guard uniform on the cover of a book titled The Condition of Chinese Avant-Garde Art (figure 1.01). Qi Zhilong's China Girl references a Maoist history of vanguardism, yet is infused with the soft come-hither glow of contemporary commodity culture. It appeals to Western desires for a Chinese avant-garde as political fetish that ventriloquizes liberal freedom of expression. It represents a Chinese break from the collectivized past of Maoist modernity even while remaining influenced by its revolutionary aesthetics. It also represents the persistence of gender politics in the confluence of avant-garde ideologies.

作为对我所进入领域的描述，xianfeng 既意味着北京作为国家首都的历史性政治先锋，也意味着它长期培育的艺术活动形式。它包含着革命尚武精神与文化世界主义。只有把 avant-garde、qianwei、xianfeng 这些跨语言碎片组装起来，我们才能理解它们在中国当代艺术语境中的文化相遇。以一本题为《中国前卫艺术状况》的书封面为例（图 1.01），画中是一位穿红卫兵制服的年轻女子。祁志龙的《中国姑娘》指涉毛泽东主义的先锋历史，却又注入当代商品文化那种柔软诱人的光晕。它迎合西方对中国前卫的欲望——把中国前卫当作一种政治恋物，替西方代言自由表达。它代表中国对毛泽东主义现代性集体化过去的断裂，同时又仍受其革命美学影响。它也代表着性别政治在前卫意识形态汇流中的持续存在。

This chapter examines the remaking of Beijing first through an overview of cultural policy in relation to the capital city, and of avant-garde genealogies.[6] It then portrays this remaking through a montage of ethnographic fragments organized around key art institutions—academy, palace, village, and museum—as they shift from sites of revolutionary nationalism to culture industry formation. Montage as method underlies the composition of this book, which assembles an account of cultural transition from closely observed ethnographic fragments and builds its argument across chapters. It is an assemblage whose theory of knowledge arises from dialectical contrasts between colliding myths of progress and modernity. Its compositional aesthetics reflect those of the artists I focus on, whose works often represent "dialectics at a standstill."[7] Bringing gender to the analysis heightens awareness of the relationship between avant-gardism and nationalism, and thus the need to deconstruct the avant-garde myth of originality as a repressive and colonizing technology whose professed faith in renewal and innovation masks its power plays.

本章首先概述与首都相关的文化政策及前卫谱系，以考察北京的再造。[6] 随后，本章通过围绕关键艺术机构——学院、宫、村和博物馆——组织的一组民族志碎片蒙太奇，描绘这种再造，观察它们如何从革命民族主义的场所转变为文化产业的形成之地。蒙太奇作为一种方法，是本书构成的底层逻辑：它从细致观察的民族志碎片中组装出一部文化转型叙述，并跨章节构建论证。这是一个拼装体，其知识理论产生于相互碰撞的进步神话与现代性神话之间的辩证对照。它的构成美学也映照我所聚焦的艺术家的美学，他们的作品常常表现 " 停顿中的辩证法 "。[7] 把性别带入分析，会提高对前卫主义与民族主义之关系的自觉，也因此更需解构关于原创性的前卫神话——一种压制性的殖民化技术，它对革新与创新的公开信仰掩盖着权力游戏。

The artists I interviewed lived in locations scattered throughout Beijing, a megacity at the turn of the millennium of more than 10 million people. The logistics of my research involved spending significant time on the subway, on buses, in cabs, or on carts attached to the back of three-wheeled motorcycles. In a Shijingshan District classroom, a college art teacher painted a wall-sized canvas crowded with popular figures ranging from politicians to movie stars, in a style influenced by propaganda posters and folk art. In the semirural Western Hills, a painter-turned-video artist from Anhui vented about local and global cultural hierarchies in a rudimentary brick dwelling rented from a farmer. In a Chongwen District high-rise, a painter-turned-performance artist living in a concrete-box apartment on the tenth floor took photos from her window of the construction site next door. In Songzhuang artist village, a cluster of studios built on farmland in Tongzhou District, the "political pop" painter whose massive compound I visited with a group of curators wasn't home. Instead, a hired apprentice from the countryside worked away on one of his paintings that fetched record prices on the international market.

我访谈的艺术家住在北京各处。世纪之交的北京是一座拥有逾千万人口的特大城市。我的研究后勤意味着要在地铁、公共汽车、出租车或三轮摩托车后挂的板车上花费大量时间。在石景山区的一间教室里，一位大学美术教师画了一幅满墙大小的油画，画中挤满从政治家到电影明星的流行人物，风格受宣传画和民间艺术影响。在西山半乡村地区，一位来自安徽、从画家转行的录像艺术家在向农民租来的简陋砖房里，发泄对地方与全球文化等级的不满。在崇文区一栋高层建筑里，一位从画家转行的行为艺术家住在十楼的混凝土火柴盒公寓中，从窗口拍摄隔壁工地。在宋庄艺术家村——通州区农田上建起的一片画室群——我随一群策展人去了那位“政治波普”画家的巨大院落，但他不在家。一个从乡下雇来的学徒正替他画一幅在国际市场上创下纪录价格的画。

In spite of their differences, these artists routinely reiterated Beijing's status as China's "cultural center" (wenhua zhongxin), although their counterparts in the provinces often asserted the freedom of being "far from the emperor's eye." This belief in Beijing's prominence persisted through the 1990s in spite of the fact that contemporary art exhibits in the capital were shut down with greater regularity than in other cities with burgeoning art scenes like Shanghai or Chengdu. The infamous reputation of the Beijing Ministry of Culture led to jokes about how censorship of an exhibit guaranteed foreign attention. When I asked artists, especially those without Beijing residence permits, work units, or familial connections, why they wanted to live there, some mentioned the large number of universities, including the Central Academy of Fine Arts, a historical sense of Beijing as imperial seat of culture, or even the creative tension of official opposition. Others responded along the lines of "because I can meet people like you," meaning a foreigner. Beijing's embassy districts and foreign-owned galleries catering to overseas buyers led to the development of a patronage system that attracted curators and art brokers from abroad. This magnetism eventually became a resource for the state's remaking of Beijing.

尽管有种种差异，这些艺术家仍经常重申北京作为中国“文化中心”（wenhua zhongxin）的地位，尽管外省的同行常说“天高皇帝远”的自由。这种对北京重要性的信念在整个 20 世纪 90 年代持续存在，尽管首都的当代艺术展比上海或成都等艺术场景蓬勃发展的城市更频繁地被关闭。设在北京的文化部声名狼藉，以致人们开玩笑说，一个展览只要被查禁，就保证能引起外国关注。当我问艺术家——尤其是那些没有北京户口、单位或家庭关系的人——为什么想住在这里时，有人提到这里大学众多，包括中央美术学院；有人提到北京作为帝国文化中心的历史感；还有人提到官方反对所带来的创造性张力。其他人的回答则是“因为我能遇到像你这样的人”，意思是外国人。北京的使馆区和面向海外买家的外资画廊促成了一个赞助网络，吸引来自国外的策展人和艺术经纪人。这种吸引力最终成为国家再造北京的一项资源。

After the controversial closures of the China/Avant-Garde exhibit in 1989, followed by the events of June 4, the national Ministry of Culture initially turned its sights toward the south. The first China Art Exposition (Zhongguo yishu bolanhui), the nation's largest showcase of contemporary art, was launched in 1993 in Guangzhou's Chinese Import-Export Commodities Trade Center. This linkage between art and commerce occurred one year after Deng Xiaoping's highly publicized tour of the south. During his visit to the special economic zones of Guangzhou and Shenzhen, he praised their commercial successes and advocated market reform as the way for China to overcome its recent domestic turmoil and open connections with the world through trade.

1989 年中国现代艺术展引发争议地关闭，随后又发生 6 月 4 日事件，国家文化部最初把目光转向南方。1993 年，全国最大的当代艺术展示会——第一届中国艺术博览会（Zhongguo yishu bolanhui）——在广州的中国进出口商品交易中心推出。艺术与商业的这种联结，发生在邓小平高调南巡一年之后。在访问广州和深圳经济特区期间，邓小平称赞其商业成就，主张把市场改革作为中国克服国内动荡、通过贸易与世界连接的道路。

In 1995, organizers moved the China Art Expo to Beijing, claiming its location in Guangzhou had not garnered sufficient international attention. In the early 2000s, the weeklong art exposition continued to be held every summer in Beijing's International Exhibition Center. Rows of numbered booths, rented by artists, galleries, art schools, publishing houses, antique dealers, and companies promoting art and culture, filled two cavernous halls. Many artists welcomed the Expo, in spite of its Ministry of Culture sponsorship, as an alternative to official exhibition spaces. After an initial period of enthusiasm, some dismissively likened the Expo to a hodgepodge marketplace, a maze of street stall getihu (independent entrepreneurs), with no distinction between good and bad. The most disparaging had begun showing their work in Beijing's foreign-run galleries. Their desire for the distinction of market valuation ran counter to one of the original rationales for the Expo, a commercial twist on the socialist goal of "serving the people": that offering art at affordable prices would combat elitism and make the nation's art accessible to the general public.[8]

1995 年，组织者把中国艺术博览会移到北京，称其广州选址未能获得足够的国际关注。21 世纪初，为期一周的艺术博览会仍每年夏天在北京国际展览中心举行。艺术家、画廊、美术学校、出版社、古董商以及推广艺术与文化的公司租下成排编号展位，填满两个巨大展厅。尽管博览会由文化部主办，许多艺术家仍把它当作官方展览空间之外的替代选择而欢迎它。最初的热情过后，一些人轻蔑地把博览会比作大杂烩市场，一个由街边摊位个体户（getihu）组成的迷宫，好坏不分。最不屑一顾的人已开始在北京外资画廊展出作品。他们对市场估值区隔的渴望，与博览会最初的理据之一相抵触——那是对社会主义“为人民服务”目标的商业式改写：以可负担的价格提供艺术，将对抗精英主义，使全国艺术为普通公众所接近。[8]

The move of the Expo also represented a symbolic struggle between north and south. After Guangzhou proved that promoting cultural festivals and programs was good for business, Beijing adopted the model. Jing Wang notes, "The recent hype about Beijing's capital impact (shoudu xiao-ying) was the result of an intensifying image race orchestrated and monitored closely by the Department of the Strategies of Cultural Development in Shanghai, Guangzhou, and Beijing. As Shanghai and Guangzhou shifted their emphasis of urban planning from industrial to cultural economy, Beijing followed suit."[9] In 1996, Beijing's Municipal Political Consultative Committee articulated a new development strategy, "founding the capital through culture" (wenhua lidu).[10] They highlighted Beijing's historical heritage as a reserve of cultural capital that financial or commercial cities like Shanghai and Guangzhou could never attain. The city government soon began investing in the large-scale construction of new cultural institutions, a trend that accelerated after Beijing won the bid in 2001 for the 2008 Olympics.[11]

博览会的迁移也代表着南北之间的象征性斗争。在广州证明推广文化节庆和项目有利于商业之后，北京采用了这一模式。王瑾指出：“近来关于北京‘首都效应’（shoudu xiao-ying）的炒作，是上海、广州和北京的文化发展战略部门精心编排并密切监控的一场形象竞赛不断加剧的结果。当上海和广州把城市规划重点从工业经济转向文化经济时，北京也紧随其后。”[9] 1996 年，北京市政协提出新的发展战略“文化立都”（wenhua lidu）。[10] 他们强调北京的历史遗产是文化资本的储备，上

海和广州这类金融或商业城市永远无法获得。市政府很快开始投资大规模建设新文化机构，这一趋势在北京 2001 年赢得 2008 年奥运会主办权后加速。[11]

This race between Beijing and other Chinese cities to develop the “tertiary sector” of culture as proof of their global arrival represented a major shift in national spatial ideology. Maoist rhetoric celebrated the revolutionary qualities of the rural peasantry as a vanguard force in the communist nation’s progress. A post-Mao focus on urbanization made cities the new national object of desire and resignified rural people as backward or stuck in the past. State-disseminated discourse on suzhi (quality) reinforced the idea that rural citizens, relative to their urban counterparts, most needed to raise their suzhi, even as official economic strategy led to widening material disparity between city and country.[12] This state redirection and investment in cities corresponded with a transformation from coercive to regulatory forms of governance.[13] For example, the Ministry of Culture, once viewed as a policing body, became the sponsor of the China Art Expo. In Jing Wang’s words, “The state’s rediscovery of culture as a site where new ruling technologies can be deployed and converted simultaneously into economic capital constitutes one of its most innovative strategies of statecraft since the founding of the People’s Republic.”[14]

北京与其他中国城市之间这场发展文化“第三产业”、以证明其全球抵达的竞赛，代表着国家空间意识形态的重大转变。毛泽东主义修辞赞扬农村农民作为共产主义国家进步先锋力量的革命品质。后毛泽东时代对城市化的关注使城市成为新的国家欲望对象，并把农村人重新意指为落后或停滞在过去。国家传播的关于“素质”（suzhi）的话语强化了这一观念：与城市居民相比，农村公民最需要提高素质，即便官方经济战略导致城乡物质差距扩大。[12] 国家对城市的重新定向和投资，与治理从强制性形式向规制性形式的转变相对应。[13] 例如，文化部曾被视为管控机构，如今却成了中国艺术博览会的赞助者。用王瑾的话说：“国家重新发现文化，把它当作可以部署新的统治技术并同时转化为经济资本的场所，这是中华人民共和国成立以来最具创新的治国策略之一。”[14]

Shi Xinning's "Duchamp Retrospective Exhibition" in China (figure 1.02) juxtaposes iconic symbols of the avant-garde of Western art and Chinese socialism. In a fictional encounter of "impossible reality"—an altered reproduction of an image taken at an official visit to an industrial exhibition by one of Mao Zedong's official photographers (figure 1.03)—Shi depicts the chairman intently inspecting Marcel Duchamp's Fountain.[15] On the one hand, it references the Great Leap Forward, Mao's campaign beginning in 1958 to transform the country through rapid industrialization, when exhibits of modern amenities became a staple of Cold War politics. A year after Mao's tour of the biogas exhibition, evidence of China's progress toward surpassing capitalist development within fifteen years, Khrushchev and Nixon hotly debated their nations' technological superiority in a model American kitchen on display in Moscow.[16] Mao's gaze turns a stove into a politic symbol of surpassing the enemy. On the other hand, Shi's black-and-white painting references the avant-garde aesthetic of Marcel Duchamp, who promoted conceptual thought over visual pleasure. Duchamp's idea of the readymade became the "antiart" move that secured his place of prominence in modern art history. Through a process of selection and alteration, he transformed ordinary manufactured objects into art. Fountain, the urinal he signed R. Mutt and first exhibited in 1917, has come to serve as a critique of the museum's institutional power to convey artistic value. (Shi's image collision draws the humorous connection between urinal and biogas stove: of excrement powering modernity.) Preparations for a Duchamp retrospective exhibition were in fact contemporaneous with the photo of Mao's exhibition visit; it eventually opened in 1963 at the Pasadena Museum of Art. Shi makes these two avant-garde visions proximal. His documentary style of painting, based on his training in socialist realism at Shenyang's Lu Xun Academy of Fine Arts, mimics the way artists under Mao reworked historical paintings in response to political winds.[17] The resulting "impossible reality" imbricates the masculinist chess match of Cold War politics with that of Western modernist aesthetics. The readymade in Shi Xinning's painting—the photograph he reproduces, the urinal he places in it—becomes a symbolic fetish animated by opposing versions of historicism and surpassing the other.

式。[17] 由此产生的“不可能的现实”，把冷战政治的男性主义棋局与西方现代主义美学的棋局嵌合在一起。石心宁画中的现成品——他复制的照片、他放入照片中的小便池——成为一个象征性恋物，由相互对立的历史主义版本和超越对方之欲所激活。

In my conversations with artists, they often reflected ambivalently on what it meant to be called avant-garde. One artist had created an altar to Mao Zedong in the corner of his studio, an installation piece as he called it. He provided a revisionist history as he looped avant-garde back to the role of culture in Maoist thought. At the center of the installation was an old dresser mirror purchased at a junk market. The slogan “to serve the people,” now chipped and faded, had been painted in red at the top of the mirror. Cultural Revolution images of Mao stuck in its wooden border framed the face of whoever looked into the mirror. Other propaganda images and a pair of red candles were laid as offerings in front of the mirror. His memory of the Cultural Revolution contained scars—police had investigated him as a teenager for allegedly writing an anti-Mao slogan on a village wall—but he remained in awe of the pervasiveness of its aesthetic, the everyday influence of decorated mirrors like the one he’d found discarded. He disparaged the materialistic ethos that permeated the current era and the professionalized circuits of its so-called avant-garde: “In my view, if we’re talking about people who make so-called avant-garde art, I think Mao Zedong was the greatest avant-garde artist. He really was unmatched. Under his orchestration, the clothes that people wore, the soldiers’ uniforms, were all blue, everything was that kind of thing, with everyone standing together. For avant-garde artists to do this today, that would really be an amazing piece. My worship for Mao is as an artist.... He was really an artist not a politician. He really couldn’t be a politician.”[18]

在与艺术家的交谈中，他们常常矛盾地反思被称为前卫意味着什么。一位艺术家在画室一角做了一座毛泽东祭坛，他称之为装置作品。他把前卫绕回毛泽东主义思想中文化的作用，提供了一种修正主义历史。装置中央是一面从旧货市场买来的旧梳妆镜。镜子上方用红漆写着“为人民服务”，如今已斑驳褪色。嵌在木边框里的毛泽东文革时期图像，框住任何照镜者的脸。镜前摆放着其他宣传图像和一对红烛作为供品。他对文革的记忆带有创伤——十几岁时，警方曾调查他，指称他在村墙上写了反毛标语——但他对这种美学无孔不入的力量仍心存敬畏，比如他捡到的那面被丢弃的装饰镜，仍在日常生活中发挥影响。他贬斥弥漫在当下时代的物质主义风气，以及所谓前卫的专业化圈子：“在我看来，如果谈所谓前卫艺术的创作者，我认为毛泽东是最伟大的前卫艺术家。他真是无人能及。在他的编排下，人们穿的衣服、士兵的军装都是蓝色的，一切都是那一套，所有人站在一起。今天的前卫艺术家若能做到这一点，那才会是惊人的作品。我对毛的崇拜是作为艺术家……他真的是艺术家，不是政治家。他真的当不了政治家。”[18]

At a dinner party of exactly the kind of artists he disparaged, contradictions still came to the fore. They gathered in a painter's renovated apartment, which had just been featured in an interior design magazine. After discussion about home decorating principles, the pros and cons of ikea's influence in Beijing, and the travails involved in securing visas for travel to overseas exhibits, the conversation turned toward the position of intellectuals in Chinese society. A debate broke out about Lu Xun, the highly regarded twentieth-century writer, social critic, and proponent of the leftist woodblock movement, canonized by the Chinese Communist Party after his death in 1936. One artist commented that for all their recent material accumulation and aspiration to cultural refinement, they couldn't come close to Lu Xun's lifestyle. He'd been reading Lu Xun's diaries and was struck by the resources he had. Converting Lu Xun's reported income into modern currency, he claimed it would be tens of thousands of yuan a month. In his assessment, Lu Xun spent most of his free time buying things—books, paintings, antiques, even old courtyard homes. Others joked that Lu Xun had become such an acerbic social critic because every morning he would bargain with art and antique dealers on Liulichang Street. Angry at being cheated out of a good price, he would return home and use his pen to curse people. As they debated whether this information about Lu Xun made him a cultural connoisseur to emulate or a leisured and thus hypocritical social critic, I realized that this literary gossip was about trying to figure out, via a reevaluation of a symbol like Lu Xun, their place in the national order of things.

在他所贬斥的那类艺术家的饭局上，矛盾依然浮现。他们聚集在一位画家翻新的公寓里，这套公寓刚被一本室内设计杂志报道。讨论过家居装饰原则、宜家在北京影响的好坏，以及出国参展签证的种种麻烦之后，话题转向知识分子在中国社会中的位置。一场关于鲁迅的争论爆发了。这位20世纪作家、社会批评家和左翼木刻运动倡导者备受尊崇，1936年去世后被中国共产党奉为经典。一位艺术家评论说，尽管他们近来积累了物质财富、追求文化修养，却远远比不上鲁迅的生活方式。他一直在读鲁迅日记，对其拥有的资源感到震惊。把鲁迅记载的收入换算成现代货币，他声称每月可达数万元。按他的判断，鲁迅大部分空闲时间都在买东西——书、画、古董，甚至旧四合院。其他人开玩笑说，鲁迅之所以成为如此尖刻的社会批评家，是因为他每天早上都在琉璃厂街与书画商和古董商讨价还价。因被坑了价钱而愤怒，他回家后用笔骂人。当他们争论这些关于鲁迅的信息究竟使他成为值得效仿的文化鉴赏家，还是一个有闲因而虚伪的社会批评家时，我意识到，这些文学八卦其实是在通过重新评价鲁迅这样的象征，弄清自己在国家秩序中的位置。

The images that many of these artists produced are cultural signs that point in different directions, a characteristic that emerges from and interrupts a Communist past. Tani Barlow observes, “All signs in a Maoist culture regime would, by definition, always have two potential referents. In theory, all national forms pointed backward to the national (and thus feudal) past and simultaneously forward to the bright potential of socialism. The Maoist framing of culture institutionalized this instability.”[19] As Chinese contemporary artists wrangled with what it meant to be avant-garde, they continued to embrace the instability of the Maoist cultural sign, even as they worked in a space of encounter like that of Shi Xinning’s painting, where “avant-garde” sparks different chains of genealogical signification.

这些艺术家中的许多人创作的图像，是指向不同方向的文化符号；这一特征从共产主义过去中浮现，并打断那个过去。白露观察到：“在毛泽东主义文化体制中，按定义，所有符号总会有两个潜在的指涉对象。理论上，所有民族形式既向后指向民族的（因而也是封建的）过去，同时向前指向社会主义的光明潜能。毛泽东主义的文化框定使这种不稳定性制度化。”[19] 当中国当代艺术家争论前卫意味着什么时，他们继续拥抱毛泽东主义文化符号的不稳定性，即使他们是在像石心宁绘画那样的相遇空间中工作——在那里，“前卫”激发不同的谱系意指链条。

The term's French origins date to the nineteenth century, when it connoted a close association between culture and socialist politics. Baudelaire used it in the 1860s as a term of contempt for leftist writers. Renato Poggioli traces how, after the 1871 suppression of the Paris Commune, the term came to refer to a separate artistic movement. The avant-garde, in his description, maintained an autonomous but parallel existence with the political left. Its practitioners were bohemian iconoclasts devoted to innovation and futurity. Poggioli further argues that the avant-garde could only flourish in a liberal society: "Avant-garde art is by nature incapable of surviving not only the persecution but even the protection or the official patronage of a totalitarian state and a collective society, whereas the hostility of public opinion can be useful to it."[20] It thus depends on, even if through opposition to, free-market liberalism. Peter Bürger further argues that the embrace of the avant-garde by the very establishment institutions it opposed led to its death. When museums absorbed avant-garde art into a system complicit with capitalism, they neutralized its critical function.[21]

这个词的法国起源可追溯至 19 世纪，当时它意味着文化与社会主义政治的紧密关联。波德莱尔在 19 世纪 60 年代用它来蔑视左翼作家。雷纳托 • 波焦利追溯了 1871 年巴黎公社被镇压后，这个词如何转变为指涉一个独立的艺术运动。在他笔下，前卫与政治左派保持自主但平行的存在。其实践者是献身创新与未来的波西米亚式偶像破坏者。波焦利进一步论证，前卫只能在自由社会中繁荣：" 前卫艺术在本质上不仅无法在极权国家和集体社会的迫害下生存，甚至无法在其保护或官方赞助下生存，而舆论的敌意却可能对它有益。"[20] 因此，它依赖自由市场自由主义，哪怕是通过与之对立的方式。彼得 • 比尔格进一步论证，正是前卫所反对的建制机构对它的接纳导致了它的死亡。当博物馆把前卫艺术吸收进与资本主义同谋的体系，它们便中和了它的批判功能。[21]

"Avant-garde" entered Chinese through neologisms produced by early-twentieth-century translations of French, Japanese, and Russian sources. Chinese intellectuals working under the conditions of semicolonialism produced an era of furious translingual practice, as they brought concepts from foreign sources to bear on their struggle for national sovereignty. Art and politics in this context could not be understood as separate, as Gao Minglu argues in his theorization of China's "total modernity," marking its cultural and historical difference from the autonomous conception of the avant-garde in the West.[22]

"Avant-garde" 经由 20 世纪初从法文、日文和俄文来源翻译中产生的新词进入中文。在半殖民主义条件下工作的中国知识分子，经历了狂热的跨语言实践时代，他们引入外来概念，以服务于争取民族主权的斗争。在这种语境中，艺术与政治不能理解为彼此分离，正如高名潞在关于中国 " 总体现代性 " 的理论化中所论证的，中国与西方前卫的自主观念之间存在着文化和历史差异。[22]

An early use of the term appears in Lin Wenzheng's review of the first Capital Fine Arts Exhibition, held in Nanjing in 1928. He praises the work by several artists as "the avant-garde [qianfeng] of modern China's art world," and advocates an art of the people, supported by public institutions, that will raise their spiritual consciousness and national sensibility to a level equivalent with European society.[23] In Japan, the term appeared in formations such as Sasaki Takamaru's Avant-Garde Theater and Kurahara Korehito's Alliance of Avant-Garde Artists. Chinese dramatist Tian Han met both during his 1927 visit to Tokyo, during which Sasaki warned him against the empty rhetoric of artistic autonomy.[24] Kurahara had recently returned from the Soviet Union and became the leading Marxist theoretician during the Japanese proletarian art movement of the late 1920s and early 1930s. The kanji they used for avant-garde traveled back to China as qianwei.[25]

这个词的早期使用出现在林文铮对 1928 年在南京举办的首届首都美术展览会的评论中。他称赞几位艺术家的作品是 " 中国现代艺术界的前卫（qianfeng）"，并倡导一种由公共机构支持的人民艺术，以把他们的精神意识和民族感受力提升到与欧洲社会相当的水平。[23] 在日本，这个词出现于佐佐木孝丸的《前卫剧场》和藏原惟人的 " 前卫艺术家同盟 " 等组合中。中国剧作家田汉 1927 年访问东京时见过两人，佐佐木警告他不要空谈艺术自主。[24] 藏原惟人最近从苏联归来，成为 20 世纪 20 年代末和 30 年代初日本无产阶级艺术运动的主要马克思主义理论家。他们用于 "avant-garde" 的汉字传回中国，成为 " 前卫 "。[25]

Other versions emerged in usages by the Guomindang, as well as by critics like Lu Xun. In 1930, the Guomindang government promoted a nationalist literary movement to counter the rise of revolutionary literature. New journals such as Qianfeng zhoubao (Avant-garde weekly) and Qianfeng yuebao (Avant-garde monthly) published patriotic stories featuring heroic battle scenes. Lu Xun attacked one of these writers for his comparison of Chinese nationalists fighting warlords with French colonists fighting native Arabs in the African desert, as a telling identification with imperial masters.[26] One year later, he published a commemorative issue of the underground magazine Qianshao (Vanguard or Frontline) mourning the Guomindang execution of five left-wing writers. Through his support of the 1930s woodcut movement, Lu Xun advocated an avant-garde aesthetic that publicly called for a collective political struggle. After the Communist defeat of the Guomindang in 1949, the party codified this association in its claim to be the vanguard (xianfeng) of the proletariat, a term that in 1989 would be resignified once again by Chinese art world participants, through and in relation to previous histories.

国民党以及鲁迅等批评家的用法中，也出现了其他版本。1930 年，国民党政府推动一场民族主义文学运动，以对抗革命文学的兴起。《先锋周报》（Qianfeng zhoubao）和《先锋月刊》（Qianfeng yuebao）等新刊物发表描写英雄战斗场面的爱国故事。鲁迅抨击其中一位作家把与军阀作战的中国民族主义者比作在非洲沙漠中与土著阿拉伯人作战的法国殖民者，认为这暴露了其对帝国主子的认同。[26] 一年后，他在地下刊物《前哨》（Qianshao，意为 Vanguard 或 Frontline）出版纪念专号，哀悼被国民党处决的五位左翼作家。通过支持 20 世纪 30 年代木刻运动，鲁迅倡导一种公开呼吁集体政治斗争的前卫美学。1949 年共产党击败国民党后，党把这种联系编入其作为无产阶级先锋队（xianfeng）的主张；这个术语在 1989 年又被中国艺术界参与者通过并与先前历史相关联地再次重新意指。

In her critique of modernist art discourse, Rosalind Krauss argues that the notion of the avant-garde depends on a discourse of originality, even though "the actual practice of vanguard art tends to reveal that 'originality' is a working assumption that itself emerges from a ground of repetition and recurrence."[27] Promoters of Western modernism as an advancing force produce the avant-garde doctrine of newness, in part, by casting artists from other parts of the world as belated and derivative, closing off a history of the Western canon as itself a series of borrowings.[28] The rise of artistic modernism coincided with a period of rapid decolonization when European powers established legal agreements such as the Berne Convention to protect their ownership of works developed in colonial contexts and through non-Western influences.[29] Modern intellectual property regimes define and protect innovation, granting individual creators rights vis-à-vis the nation-state. The repressions of avant-gardism are deeply linked to the development of the modern militant nation-state and ideologies of surpassing. Introducing gender into the picture makes the act of deconstruction even more imperative.

罗莎琳德·克劳斯在批判现代主义艺术话语时论证，前卫观念依赖原创性话语，尽管"前卫艺术的实际实践往往揭示出，'原创性'本身是一个从重复与再现的土壤中浮现的工作假设"。[27] 把西方现代主义作为进步力量加以推广的人，部分通过把世界其他地区的艺术家塑造成迟到的、派生的，来生产前卫的新颖教义，同时封闭西方正典自身作为一系列借鉴的历史。[28] 艺术现代主义的兴起恰逢快速去殖民化时期，欧洲列强建立伯尔尼公约等法律协议，以保护它们对在殖民语境中、通过非西方影响发展出的作品的所有权。[29] 现代知识产权制度界定并保护创新，赋予个体创作者相对于民族国家的权利。前卫主义的压制与现代战斗性民族国家和超越意识形态的发展深刻相连。把性别引入图景，使解构行动更加迫切。

In Take Hold of the Brush, Struggle to the End (1997; plate 3), Wang Qingsong reworks a widely circulated propaganda poster from the end of the Cultural Revolution (plate 4). Xiao Zhenya and Liu Enbin's work reproduces in the background a well-known 1972 portrait of Lu Xun by Tang Xiaoming, Never Give Up the Struggle. The two lines of calligraphy on the right are a couplet from a poem by Lu Xun: "Fierce-browed, I coolly defy a thousand pointing fingers, / Head bowed, like a willing ox I serve the children." In 1942, Mao Zedong ended his talks on art and literature at the Communist guerrilla base in Yan'an with this couplet. The talks, which came to serve as party doctrine, compelled cultural workers to "enter life" (shenru shenghuo), meaning that of workers and peasants, to learn from the people in order to create revolutionary, consciousness-raising works. Mao's thinking reversed the Marxist understanding of culture as superstructure reflecting the economic base and instead envisaged culture as leading the base. He interpreted Lu Xun's couplet in the following way: "The 'thousand pointing fingers' are our enemies, and we will never yield to them, no matter how ferocious. The 'children' here symbolize the proletariat and the masses. All Communists, all revolutionaries, all revolutionary literary and art workers should learn from the example of Lu Xun and be 'oxen' for the proletariat and the masses, bending their backs to the task until their dying day."[30] With this history as backdrop, a female young pioneer (a member of the shaonian xianfeng dui) stands with a calligraphy brush poised over a blank sheet of paper. In 1958, Mao had exhorted the nation's citizens to use calligraphy to express their demands through big-character posters: "Apart from their other characteristics, the outstanding thing about China's 600 million people is that they are 'poor and blank.' This may seem a bad thing, but in reality it is a good thing. Poverty gives rise to the desire for change, the desire for action and the desire for revolution. On a blank sheet of paper free from any mark, the freshest and most beautiful characters can be written, the freshest and most beautiful pictures can be painted."[31] In 1974, Xiao and Liu's poster advocated a leftist line that upheld calligraphy over the practice of romanizing Chinese, seen as subservient to the West. Their inclusion of Lu Xun as a historical force overseeing a yet unwritten future also presents an incongruence, since he had proposed abandoning characters for an alphabet.[32]

在《拿起笔，战斗到底》（1997；图版 3）中，王庆松改写了文革末期广泛流传的一张宣传画（图版 4）。Xiao Zhenya 与 Liu Enbin 的作品在背景中复现了汤小铭 1972 年为鲁迅所作的名画《永不休战》。右侧两行书法是鲁迅一首诗中的对联：“ 横眉冷对千夫指，俯首甘为孺子牛。”1942 年，毛泽东在延安共产党游击根据地的文艺座谈会讲话末尾引用了这副对联。那次讲话后来成为党的方针，要求文化工作者“ 深入生活 ”（shenru shenghuo），即深入工农生活，向人民学习，以创作革命的、提高觉悟的作品。毛泽东的思想颠倒了马克思主义关于文化是反映经济基础的上层建筑的理解，转而把文化设想为引领基础。他对鲁迅这副对联的解释是：“‘ 千夫指 ’，就是敌人，无论多么凶恶，我们绝不屈服。这里的 ‘ 孺子 ’，是指无产阶级和人民大众。一切共产党员，一切革命家，一切革命的文艺工作者，都应该学鲁迅的榜样，做无产阶级和人民大众的 ‘ 牛 ’，鞠躬尽瘁，死而后已。”[30] 以这段历史为背景，一位女少先队员（少年先锋队成员）站在一张空白纸前，手持毛笔。1958 年，毛泽东曾号召全国人民用书法写大字报表达诉求：“ 除了其他特点之外，中国六亿人口的一个显著特点是一 ‘ 穷 ’ 二 ‘ 白 ’。这看起来是坏事，其实是好事。穷则思变，要干，要革命。一张白纸，没有负担，好写最新最美的文字，好画最新最美的画图。”[31] 1974 年，Xiao 与 Liu 的宣传画倡导一条坚持书法、反对汉字拉丁化的左倾路线，因为拉丁化被视为屈从西方。他们把鲁迅作为俯瞰一个尚未书写的未来的历史力量，也造成某种不协调，因为鲁迅曾提议废除汉字改用字母。[32]

In Wang Qingsong's 1997 restaging of the poster, one of his earliest experiments in conceptual photography, the artist himself replaces the "red, bright, and shining" girl. A male entrepreneurial subject represents the new vanguard poised to compete on the international cultural market. His raised hand holds an oil painting brush, the tool that facilitated his entry into that market. While he remains caught in the middle ground of the picture plane, the future before him is no longer "poor and blank" but filled with cultural trappings of wealth: traditional gold ingots symbolizing prosperity, preparatory textbooks for the national university entrance exam, and a fan of foreign currency. In place of Mao's little red book in the lower left-hand corner lies a thin publication. Wang's reworked version of the poster appears on the cover, harking back to the ubiquity of Cultural Revolution propaganda while also alluding to the artist's image as a form of currency that enables the spatiotemporal extension of his personhood, a sign of having entered the world. Incongruous now is the Lu Xun couplet, which begs the question of what the "thousand pointing fingers," the "children," and the "oxen" symbolize in the current era.

In visual exchanges over space and time, Chinese contemporary artists negotiated different systems of artistic evaluation. They complained about intermittent Chinese state cultural control, but also their management by Western gallerists. Wang Qingsong, for example, worked as an oil painter until 1997 and was represented by a London gallery specializing in Chinese contemporary art. A series of his paintings titled Speechless, depicting distorted faces and bodies trapped in plastic sheets, sold well to their clientele. When he informed the gallery managers of his plan to move into conceptual photography, they advised him to stick with his established style of painting, which guaranteed a predictable return value. Surprised by this lack of support for creative innovation, he began to question the purported freedom of the market system.[33] On the other side of the equation, Western gallerists complained that Chinese artists undermined themselves by not following established market rules. They alluded to instances of artists placing their work with more than one gallery, selling work directly out of their studios, or printing additional images on demand of what they once claimed was a limited run.[34] At a 2002 symposium at the Asia Society in New York, a major collector announced that Chinese contemporary art had lost its international allure because Chinese artists had failed to fully embrace the dealer system.[35] Curators affiliated with Western museums described the difficulty of convincing their boards to acquire Chinese artwork without a gallery to guarantee its limited edition status. This discourse characterized Chinese artists as market primitives. Yet as these artists experimented with the international market, they sent into the world images haunted by temporalities forged in previous cultural encounters. Their failure to conform could also be understood as a critique of how Western institutions confer value on art; or of the Chinese state's narrative of global capitalism as the desired future of Maoist socialism.

在跨越时空的视觉交换中，中国当代艺术家协商不同的艺术评价体系。他们抱怨国家间歇性的文化控制，也抱怨西方画廊经营者的管理。例如，王庆松直到 1997 年都是油画家，由伦敦一家专营中国当代艺术的画廊代理。他题为《无语》的系列油画描绘扭曲的面孔和被困在塑料布中的身体，在客户中销路很好。当他告诉画廊管理者自己计划转向概念摄影时，他们建议他坚持已经确立的绘画风格，因为那能保证可预测的回报。这种对创意创新的不支持令他惊讶，他开始质疑市场体系所谓的自由。[33] 在等式的另一端，西方画廊经营者抱怨中国艺术家不遵守既定市场规则，因而损害自身。他们提到一些例子：艺术家同时与多家画廊合作，直接从画室卖作品，或按需求为原称限量的作品加印图像。[34] 在 2002 年纽约亚洲协会的一次研讨会上，一位重要收藏家宣称，中国当代艺术已失去国际吸引力，因为中国艺术家未能完全接受经销商制度。[35] 与西方博物馆有关联的策展人描述了说服董事会购藏中国艺术品的困难，因为没有画廊能保证其限量身份。这套话语把中国艺术家说成市场原始人。然而，当这些艺术家在国际市场上实验时，他们送入世界的图像，萦绕着在先前文化相遇中锻造的时间性。他们不遵从的行为，也可以被理解为对西方机构如何赋予艺术价值的批判，或对国家把全球资本主义叙述为毛泽东主义社会主义理想未来的批判。

Placing these Take Hold of the Brush images, produced two decades apart, alongside each other creates a stereoscopic vision that cuts into historical shadows. It makes visible a disappearing act, in which the female artist whose command of the brush once symbolized national progress vanishes from the scene. No longer pictured as vanguard producer of images, she has become instead the soft-glow cover girl of a masculinist avant-garde preoccupied with its place in the nation and the world. The girl with the brush was once a stock image of socialist liberation; a return to her early appearance reveals the persistent presence of a patriarchal figure hovering in the background. In Wang Huaiqing's 1964 woodblock print Revolution, a young girl sits at a table, pencil in hand. An older man in military uniform sits behind her, folds his hand over hers, and guides the pencil to write geming (revolution) on the sheet of paper before them. If the woodblock movement of the early twentieth century represents, as Tang Xiaobing argues, the origins of the Chinese avant-garde, the gendered evolution of its imagery in the post-1989 encounter with Western ideologies of the avant-garde disappears women. The repressive effects of this collusion include a hidden aspect of the China/Avant-Garde exhibit that came to light years after the fact.

All historical accounts of that seminal 1989 moment mention Xiao Lu's installation piece Dialogue, which she fired into, causing the exhibit's first closure. Some even retrospectively called it "the first shots of Tiananmen."[36] All of these accounts name Tang Song, a classmate present at the time and arrested together with Xiao, as cocreator of the work. This version of history dominated, to the exclusion of a nuanced interpretation of a piece dealing so obviously with gender relations. Two public telephone booths stand several feet apart. The black-and-white image of a woman's back appears in one, with that of a male counterpart in the other. Receivers pressed to their ears, they seem engaged in dialogue. On a white plinth between the booths rests a red telephone, whose receiver dangles from its cord over the side. A mirror the size and shape of the booths is positioned behind the telephone, with the lines of a red cross dividing it like a windowpane. This became the target that Xiao Lu stood before and fired into. Tang Song never denied the attribution of authorship he was granted, and he and Xiao became a couple after the incident, spending years together in Australia. After their break up and Xiao's return to China in 1997, she attempted to reclaim authorship of the piece, only to meet with general art world disdain and dismissal. She responded by creating Fifteen Shots: 1989–2003 (figure 1.04), which consists of fifteen panels, one for each of the intervening years. Life-size photographs of her grimly taking aim fade in a progression from dark intensity to washed-out grays. At a Beijing shooting range, she fired through each glass-covered panel. The bullet holes inflicted on her own image mark her injury as well as her reassertion of agency in the scene. Xiao also wrote an autobiographical novel titled Dialogue, which provides a different history for the piece. She had grown up the well-connected daughter of respected socialist realist artists. Her father became the president of Hangzhou's China Academy of Art. As a teenager she attended the attached high school of Beijing's Central Academy of Fine Arts. During her senior year, she endured sexual abuse by one of her parents' best friends, a painter her father had studied with in the Soviet Union, into whose care they had entrusted her. Xiao writes that before his final violation, he stood over the bed where she lay and said, "I'd like to paint a nude portrait of you."[37] Her controversial shots intended to shatter this personal but also institutional art history. Her arrest-worthy offence represented not just a rebellion against academic style but against patriarchal power perpetuated by the academy system.

所有关于 1989 年那个开创性时刻的历史叙述，都会提到肖鲁的装置《对话》；她向作品开枪，导致展览首次关闭。一些叙述甚至事后称之为“天安门的第一枪”。[36] 所有这些叙述都把当时在场、与肖鲁一同被捕的同学唐宋列为作品共同创作者。这一版本的历史占据主导，排除了对一件如此明显涉及性别关系的作品作细致解读的可能。两个公共电话亭相隔数英尺。一个电话亭里出现一个女人背影的黑白图像，另一个里是男性对应者。他们把听筒贴在耳边，似乎正在对话。两个电话亭之间的白色基座上放着一部红色电话，听筒从电话线垂在边缘外。电话后面立着一面与电话亭同样大小和形状的镜子，红十字把镜面分成窗格状。这成为肖鲁站到面前开枪的目标。唐宋从未否认被赋予的作者身份；事件后他和肖鲁成为情侣，一起在澳大利亚生活多年。他们分手、肖鲁 1997 年回国后，她试图重新主张这件作品的作者身份，却遭遇艺术界普遍的轻蔑与否定。她以《十五枪：1989—2003》回应（图 1.04），作品由十五块画板组成，对应其间的每一年。她神情凝重地瞄准的原尺寸照片，从幽暗浓烈逐渐褪淡为灰白。在北京一家射击场，她向每块玻璃覆盖的画板开枪。射在自己形象上的弹孔，标记她的创伤，也标记她重新主张能动性。肖鲁还写了一部题为《对话》的自传体小说，为这件作品提供了另一种历史。她成长于人脉广泛的家庭，父母都是受尊敬的社会主义现实主义艺术家。父亲后来成为杭州中国美术学院院长。十几岁时，她进入中央美术学院附中。高三那年，她遭到父母一位挚友的性侵。那是一位画家，父亲曾在苏联与他同学，父母把她托付给他照看。肖鲁写道，在他最后一次侵犯之前，他站在她躺着的床边说：“我想给你画一幅裸体肖像。”[37] 她那几声引发争议的枪响，意在击碎这段既是个人也是制度性的艺术史。她足以被捕的罪行，不仅是对学院风格的反叛，也是对学院制度延续的父权权力的反叛。

Although a number of private art schools existed in early twentieth-century China, including several focused on female education, the Shanghai Art School is often credited as China's first modern art academy.[38] Founded in 1912 as a response to a new market for commercial art, it offered tutorials in Western painting, photography, and copperplate art.[39] The young oil painter Liu Haisu, who signed his work "Art Renegade," became its most famous teacher. He adopted the Western technique of painting from a nude studio model or from nature en plein air. His defense of nude figure painting as essential to modern art education drew ongoing criticism. Accused of corrupting Chinese morality, he resisted personal attacks and bans on the practice.[40] During the May Fourth Movement (1917–21), when Chinese reformers upheld science, democracy, new culture, and women's emancipation as the path to modern nationhood, the school's situation stabilized.[41] By 1919, it received government funding and became integrated in an emerging system of national art academies that included the China Academy of Art, founded in 1928, and culminated in the 1950 establishment of the Central Academy of Fine Arts (cafa) in Beijing.[42]

尽管 20 世纪初中国已存在若干私立美术学校，其中包括几所专注女子教育的学校，上海美术专科学校仍常被称为中国第一所现代美术院校。[38] 它创办于 1912 年，回应商业美术的新市场，开设西画、摄影和铜版画课程。[39] 年轻的油画家刘海粟在作品上署名“艺术叛徒”，成为该校最著名的教师。他采用画室裸体模特和户外写生的西方技法。他为裸体人物画作为现代美术教育之必需所作的辩护，招来持续批评。被指败坏中国道德，他顶住人身攻击和对这种做法的禁令。[40] 五四运动（1917—1921）期间，中国改革者把科学、民主、新文化和妇女解放奉为现代民族国家之路，学校的处境稳定下来。[41] 到 1919 年，它获得政府资助，并融入一个正在形成的国立美术院校体系，其中包括 1928 年创办的国立艺术院，最终以 1950 年在北京成立的中央美术学院告成。[42]

In 2000, a graduate from the cafa oil painting department drew a chart for me of what she considered the three main groups involved in contemporary art production: (1) those from the huangjia (imperial family), artists who had trained in China's national academies, especially cafa, and continued to benefit from these connections; (2) qianwei (avant-garde) artists who went through the academy system but then produced experimental works that departed significantly from the styles of their training; and (3) waidi (outside) artists who migrated to urban art centers and tried to make a name for themselves. An art history graduate student at the Sichuan Fine Arts Institute produced a more rigid mapping for me: those inside the system (tizhi nei) and those outside the system (tizhi wai). "The system" included the eight main national art academies and the Chinese Artists Association. She characterized those inside the system as having social position, stability, and the security to pursue their art. In her view, those outside it felt unrecognized by Chinese society and had to appeal to foreigners for acceptance.

2000 年，一位中央美术学院油画系毕业生给我画了一张图，列出她认为参与当代艺术生产的三个主要群体：（1）“皇家”（huangjia），指在中国国立美术院校、尤其是中央美院受训，并继续从这些关系中获益的艺术家；（2）“前卫”（qianwei），指经历学院体系、但后来创作显著偏离所受训练风格的实验作品的艺术家；（3）“外地”（waidi），指迁入城市艺术中心、努力闯出名声的艺术家。四川美术学院一位艺术史研究生给我画了一张更僵硬的地图：体制内（tizhi nei）与体制外（tizhi

wai）。“ 体制 ” 包括八所主要国立美术院校和中国美术家协会。她把体制内描述为拥有社会地位、稳定性和追求艺术的保障。在她看来，体制外的人感到不被中国社会承认，必须求诸外国人获得认可。

Most of the artists I met were well trained in the types of drawing and painting—referred to by some as men piao (admissions tickets)—required in the rigorous art academy entrance examination. Prospective students gathered each year at testing centers around the country for several days. They jockeyed in crowded classrooms for the best angle and completed exercises in still life, figure drawing, charcoal and watercolor technique, and creative expression. This emphasis on technical facility reveals the influence of European pedagogy, brought back by Chinese overseas students and transmitted by Soviet advisors. Rigorous testing through set, timed exercises was a hallmark of France’s nineteenth-century École des Beaux-Arts, itself modeled after the first Western art academy, established in 1563 in Florence.[43]

我遇到的大多数艺术家，在严格美术院校入学考试所要求的素描和绘画类型上都受过良好训练——有人称之为 “ 门票 ”（men piao）。每年，考生聚集在全国各地考点，连续数日应考。他们在拥挤的教室里争抢最佳角度，完成静物、人物写生、炭笔与水彩技法以及创意表现等题目。这种对技术熟练度的强调，显示出欧洲教育学的影响——它由中国留学生带回，又经苏联顾问传播。通过固定、限时的练习进行严格测试，是法国 19 世纪巴黎国立高等美术学院的标志，而该学院本身以 1563 年佛罗伦萨创办的西方第一所美术学院为范本。[43]

Chinese visual arts curricula combined this Euro-Soviet academic tradition with Maoist practices, such as the adaptation of open-air painting to the socialist dictum of art for and of the people. During summer shixi (practicum) trips, art students shenru shenghuo (entered life) in rural locations. Their sketches and paintings focused on landscapes, traditional architecture, or local people. In the reform era, as domestic tourism replaced the political mandate to go “down to the countryside,” many teachers and students talked to me about these trips with excitement, which allowed them to visit historic cultural sites, such as the Dunhuang caves.[44] Favored locations for these trips, usually arranged by the teacher assigned to accompany the students, included the northwest and southwest, hinterland areas that were also often ethnic minority regions.

中国视觉艺术课程把这一欧苏学院传统与毛泽东主义实践结合起来，例如把户外写生改造为 “ 艺术为人民、属于人民 ” 的社会主义箴言。在夏季实习（shixi）期间，美术学生到农村 “ 深入生活 ”（shenru shenghuo）。他们的速写和绘画聚焦风景、传统建筑或当地人。改革时代，随着国内旅游取代 “ 下乡 ” 的政治任务，许多师生兴奋地向我谈起这些实习，它们让他们得以参观敦煌石窟等历史文化遗址。[44] 这些行程通常由陪同学生的教师安排，青睐的地点包括西北和西南的内陆地区，那里也常是少数民族地区。

I learned about Chinese art education by spending time in classrooms, ranging from elementary to university level. For several weeks in 2001, I drew alongside students in classes taught by Li Tianpian and He Chengyao, two of the artists I write about in part III: Feminist Sight Lines. Li Tianpian was a member of the painting faculty at Beijing's Central Minorities University, the top-tier institution for students belonging to China's fifty-five officially recognized ethnic minorities (xiaoshu minzu). Like Xiao Lu, she had tested as a teenager into the high school attached to cafa. She studied there for three years before attending the China Academy of Art in Hangzhou, where she received bachelor's and master's degrees in oil painting. Two years into her teaching position, she moved around her classroom of wooden easels and painting props with assurance, instructing models on poses, looking over the shoulders of her students, and occasionally picking up a brush to give instruction by adding marks to their canvases.

我通过在不同课堂——从小学到大学——中度过时间来了解中国美术教育。2001 年，我有几周在李天翩和何成瑶教的班里与学生一起画画；她们是我在第三部分“女性主义视线”中要写的两位艺术家。李天翩是中央民族大学绘画系教师，该校是中国 55 个官方认定少数民族（xiaoshu minzu）学生的顶尖学府。像肖鲁一样，她十几岁时考入中央美院附中，在那里学习三年，之后进入杭州中国美术学院，获得油画学士和硕士学位。任教两年后，她在摆满木画架和绘画道具的教室里自信地走动，指导模特摆姿势，从学生肩后查看，偶尔拿起画笔在他们的画布上添几笔示范。

He Chengyao, a graduate of the Sichuan Fine Arts Institute in Chong-qing, had come to Beijing to take a course in contemporary art offered at cafa for the first time in 2001. To help cover expenses, she picked up several temporary jobs, including teaching a figure drawing class to vocational school teachers required to refresh their skills every few years. Gathering on weekend mornings in a chilly, anonymous classroom, the students respected He Chengyao's academy credentials and eagerly asked her to correct their drawings. Although trained as an oil painter, she had begun experimenting with performance art, and her use of her own nude body had drawn criticism from many quarters. She confided in me that she wanted to share this work with her students but feared what most of them would think. Instead, she gently refused to draw on top of their work and urged them to explore their own styles of expression. To their disbelief, she held up my loose, untutored drawing of the head of David as an example.

何成瑶毕业于重庆四川美术学院，2001 年来北京参加中央美院首次开设的当代艺术课程。为补贴开销，她接了几份临时工作，包括给需要定期进修的职业学校教师上人物素描课。周末早晨，学生们聚在一间寒冷、没有特征的教室里，尊重何成瑶的学院资历，热切地请她修改自己的素描。她虽受油画训练，却已开始实验行为艺术，而她使用自己裸体的做法招来各方批评。她私下对我说，她想和学生分享这些作品，却害怕大多数人会怎么想。因此，她没有在他们的作品上动笔，而是温和地拒绝，并鼓励他们探索自己的表达风格。令他们难以置信的是，她举起我那幅松散、未经训练的大卫头像画作为例子。

In He Chengyao's class, I practiced the academic tradition of drawing from plaster casts. Students began by copying print reproductions of famous classical sculptures, before moving on to drawing from plaster casts of them. Only after mastering this skill could they advance to drawing from a live model. Almost every Chinese art classroom I visited had a plaster head of Michelangelo's David. My first attempt to draw it led me to realize the limitations of my life drawing classes in the United States, which had emphasized the gestural quality of line over precise, three-dimensional rendering of volume, light, and shadow. Many Chinese students complained about the rigidity of academic training but respected those who had mastered its rigors. During an interview, a cafa student who worked mainly in conceptual photography surprised me by talking about an artist who had graduated several years earlier. She admired her, not for the success she had achieved in China and abroad as an oil painter, but for her student-era plaster cast drawings. She exclaimed, "Her sketch of the head of David is still legendary among cafa students!"[45]

在何成瑶的课上，我练习从石膏像写生的学院传统。学生们先临摹古典名雕的印刷复制品，再转向石膏像写生。掌握这项技能后，他们才能进到真人模特写生。我参观的几乎每间中国美术教室都有一尊米开朗琪罗《大卫》的石膏头像。我第一次尝试画它时，意识到自己在美国的人体写生课的局限：那些课强调线条的姿态性，而非精确的三维体积、光线与阴影表现。许多中国学生抱怨学院训练的僵化，却尊重那些掌握其严苛要求的人。在一次访谈中，一位主要从事概念摄影的中央美院学生让我惊讶地谈起几年前毕业的一位艺术家。她钦佩她，不是因为她在国内外作为油画家取得的成功，而是因为她学生时代的石膏像素描。她感叹道：“她画的大卫头像在中央美院学生中至今仍是传奇！”[45]

When I first visited cafa in 2001 at its new Wangjing location, northeast of Beijing's fourth ring road, the foreign affairs officer gave me a tour. One highlight was an exhibit hall of full-size plaster casts of sculptures by Renaissance masters. Xu Beihong, the first president of cafa, brought back a set of plaster casts when he returned to China from France. I was told that all casts later used in China for teaching were copied from these "originals." I also received a set of eight commemorative photographs depicting key moments in cafa's history. One shows a 1960 lecture in the oil painting department (figure 1.05). Students and teachers face a plaster cast of Michelangelo's Rebellious Slave. The figure twists, straining to break from chains binding his hands behind his back, a metaphor in China for revolutionary nationalism. Below a big character slogan imploring students to "work hard," the instructor stands before an anatomical chart showing the muscular and skeletal structure of the figure's posture. The only woman in the room sits hunched over, recording the lecture in a notebook.[46]

2001 年，我第一次参观中央美院位于北京四环路东北的新望京校区，外事处官员带我参观。一个亮点是文艺复兴大师雕塑原尺寸石膏像的展厅。中央美院首任院长徐悲鸿从法国回国时带回一套石膏像。我听说，后来中国用于教学的所有石膏像都从这些“原件”复制而来。我还收到一套八张纪念照片，描绘中央美院历史上的关键时刻。其中一张展示 1960 年油画系的一次授课（图 1.05）。师生面对米开朗琪罗《反抗的奴隶》的石膏像。人物扭曲身体，竭力挣脱反绑双手的锁链——在中国，这是革命民族主义的隐喻。在勉励学生“努力”的大字标语下方，教师站在一张解剖图前，图上显示人物姿态的肌肉与骨骼结构。教室里唯一一位女性弓着背，把讲课记在笔记本上。[46]

cafa's original location near Tiananmen Square drew its students into another lesson in sculpture's political uses. Foreign coverage of the "Goddess of Democracy," which appeared in the Square on May 30, 1989, reported it to be a replica of the Statue of Liberty. It can also be read as a multilayered history of Chinese art academy practice.[47] When cafa sculpture students agreed to a request from protesting students to replicate the iconic statue, they had to work quickly to complete it. They constructed a model from a preexisting clay sculpture of a man grasping a pole with two raised hands, an academic study done by one of the sculpture department's studio collectives. They cut off the lower part of the pole and added a torch on top. They changed the figure from a man to a woman, modeling the face after the female figure in Soviet sculptor Vera Mukhina's A Worker and Collective Farm Woman, which stood atop the Soviet Pavilion at the 1937 Paris World's Fair. With this altered clay figure as their model, they enlarged it, carving and wiring together blocks of styrofoam, then coating them with plaster. The ten-meter-high statue, which stood for five days opposite the portrait of Mao Zedong, combines political symbols from opposite sides of the Cold War. Liberty gazed over the tumultuous square with the face of Collective Farm Woman. In Mukhina's original, she holds the Communist sickle in her raised arm.

中央美院在天安门广场附近的原址，让学生们上了另一堂关于雕塑政治用途的课。外国媒体对 1989 年 5 月 30 日出现在广场上的“民主女神”的报道称，它是自由女神像的复制品。它也可以被解读为一段多层次的中国美术学院实践史。[47] 当中央美院雕塑系学生答应抗议学生的请求复制这座标志性雕像时，他们必须迅速完成。他们以一尊先前已有的男子双手高举抓杆的泥塑为基础制作模型，那是雕塑系一个工作室集体完成的学院习作。他们截去杆的下半部分，在顶端加了一支火炬。他们把人物从男人改成女人，面孔则仿照苏联雕塑家薇拉·穆希娜《工人与集体农庄女庄

员》中的女性形象——该雕塑矗立在 1937 年巴黎世博会苏联馆顶上。以这尊改造过的泥塑为模型，他们把它放大，用泡沫塑料块雕刻，再用金属丝连缀起来，再涂上石膏。这座十米高的雕像在毛泽东画像对面矗立五天，把冷战双方的政治符号结合在一起。自由女神以集体农庄女庄员的面孔，俯瞰喧嚣的广场。在穆希娜的原作中，她举起的手臂握着共产主义的镰刀。

Many mentioned this high-profile contribution to the student protests as a factor behind cafa's relocation away from the city center. The move also corresponded with the 1990s development of the Malls at Oriental Plaza (Dongfang xin tiandi), a massive Hong Kong-financed shopping complex that took over the area of the academy's historical location. Faculty and students were temporarily displaced in former factory buildings to the northeast. By the time the academy opened in its expanded, thirty-three-acre Wangjing campus, Beijing's culture industry model of joining tracks with the world was gaining momentum. The Folk Art Department, which once trained artists in traditional arts of the peasantry, was phased out just as a new School of City Design began providing coursework in urban information, image, fashion, and video design. School leadership succeeded in luring back prominent figures who had moved overseas, such as conceptual artist Xu Bing. In 2008, as vice president of international relations, Xu announced, "China is the most avant-garde and experimental site in the world. Everything here is new."[48]

许多人提到，这一对学生抗议的高调贡献是中央美院迁离市中心的原因之一。搬迁也恰逢 20 世纪 90 年代东方广场（东方新天地）的开发——这是一个香港出资的大型购物综合体，占据了学院历史校址所在区域。师生被临时安置在东北方向的旧工厂建筑中。当学院在扩建后的三十三英亩望京校区开学时，北京“与世界接轨”的文化产业模式正积聚势头。曾培养农民传统艺术人才的民间美术系被逐步取消，同时新的城市设计学院开始提供城市信息、图像、时尚与影像设计课程。学院领导成功请回了移居海外的知名人物，如概念艺术家徐冰。2008 年，作为负责国际关系的副院长，徐冰宣布：“中国是世界上最具前卫性和实验性的现场。这里的一切都是新的。”[48]

In my interviews with artists I discovered that many had attended art classes as children in the state-run system of Young Pioneer Palaces (shao-nian gong) or Palaces of Culture (wenhua gong). Some of them, especially those from provincial cities, rather than the centrally administered municipalities of Beijing, Shanghai, and Tianjin, told me that in their youth the classes had been free and open to anyone interested. One artist explained the classes had served as childcare, especially when her parents were occupied with work or mandatory political meetings. Others described the system as extremely competitive, with students required to test into the classes, which would prepare them to eventually test into an art academy. The Soviet state had developed Palaces of Culture for its workers and children, enabling them to pursue hobbies, sports, arts, and continuing education. They represented a utopian vision of Communist society, whose collectivized labor could support cultural activities for all its citizens. This model spread to other parts of the Communist world, including China.

在访谈中我发现，许多艺术家小时候曾在国营少年宫（shaonian gong）或文化宫（wenhua gong）系统上过美术课。其中一些人——尤其是来自各省城市、而非北京、上海、天津等直辖市的人——告诉我，他们年轻时这些课程免费，任何感兴趣的人都能参加。一位艺术家解释说，这些课起到托儿所的作用，尤其是在父母忙于工作或必须参加政治会议时。另一些人则说这一体系竞争极其激烈，学生必须考试才能进班，为最终考入美术学院做准备。苏联国家曾为工人和儿童发展文化宫，使他们能够从事爱好、运动、艺术和继续教育。它们代表了一种共产主义社会的乌托邦愿景：其集体化劳动可以供养全体公民的文化活动。这一模式传播到共产主义世界的其他地区，包括中国。

To learn more about this history, I sought a palace where I could observe art classes. I networked my way to Teacher Zhao, who taught at the China National Children's Center (Zhongguo ertong zhongxin). Unlike Beijing's Young Pioneer Palaces, which fall under the authority of the municipal government, the Children's Center is administered by the All-China Women's Federation but provides very similar educational programs and activities. Located in Beijing's Xicheng District behind a gray brick wall surrounding its perimeter, the expansive campus included green lawns, colorful play equipment, a science and technology hall, art complex, gymnasium, and cinema. Glass cases lining the central walkway contained photos of model students and performances by young dancers, musicians, and thespians, as well as announcements about the center's contributions to the reform-era goal of suzhi jiaoyu (quality education/education in quality)."[49] On my way to Saturday morning classes, I passed a bronze sculpture of a waifish child with a young pioneer scarf tied around his neck, climbing a ladder in pursuit of a bird. The accompanying plaque told the story of Little Turnip Head, a boy whose body hadn't developed properly because of malnourishment under the Guomingdang. He died at the age of ten, shortly before the 1949 founding of the prc, a model of deprivation and martyrdom incongruous with the aims of the parents who now brought their children to the center. The students in Teacher Zhao's class didn't have to test in, but they did pay a class and materials fee. As a result, most of the students were children of educators and professionals from Xicheng District.

为了解这段历史，我寻找一所可以观摩美术课的少年宫或文化宫。我通过人脉找到赵老师，她在中国儿童中心（Zhongguo ertong zhongxin）任教。与隶属市政府的北京少年宫不同，中国儿童中心

由全国妇联管理，但提供非常相似的教育项目和活动。它位于北京西城区，四周环绕灰砖墙，宽阔的园区里有绿色草坪、彩色游乐设施、科技馆、艺术楼、体育馆和电影院。中央步道两侧的玻璃柜里陈列着模范学生的照片、少年舞蹈演员、乐手和戏剧演员的演出照，以及关于中心对改革时代“素质教育”（suzhi jiaoyu）目标所作贡献的介绍。[49] 走去上星期六上午的课时，我经过一座青铜雕塑：一个瘦弱的孩子脖子上系着红领巾，爬梯子追逐一只鸟。旁边的说明牌讲述小萝卜头的故事：这个男孩因在国民党统治下营养不良，身体发育不良，在 1949 年中华人民共和国成立前不久去世，年仅十岁。他是匮乏与殉难的典范，与如今送孩子来中心的家长的追求并不协调。赵老师班上的学生不必考试入学，但要交课时费和材料费。因此，大多数学生都是西城区教育工作者和专业人士的子女。

Compared to the other rather austere art classrooms I'd visited, each overseen by a plaster head of David, the classroom I entered in the summer of 2001 at the Children's Center overflowed with color, visually stimulating decorations, student-teacher banter, and music. Paintings and drawings—students' work as well as printed pictures from children's books—hung on three of the walls. Sunlight shone through large windows that extended the length of the fourth wall, illuminating brightly colored pieces of tissue paper taped to the glass. A ledge beneath the window supported a profusion of potted plants. A stuffed hare and birds of prey perched on tree branches nestled amid the green leaves and vines. Small easels were lined up below the windows. A bin of toys for young children to play with when they lost concentration stood in the corner. Along the wall opposite the windows, a massive wooden chest painted light blue held rows of small drawers, each carefully labeled with its contents—watercolor boxes, black ink, acrylic paint, brushes, plates, glasses, crayons, pencils, erasers, clay tools, etc. On top of the chest, goldfish with bulging eyes swam around a big glass bowl.

与我去过的其他相当简朴、每间都由一尊大卫石膏头像看守的美术教室相比，我 2001 年夏天走进的儿童中心教室充满色彩、视觉刺激的装饰、师生间的玩笑和音乐。三面墙上挂着绘画和素描——既有学生的作品，也有儿童书籍的印刷图片。阳光透过沿第四面墙延伸的大窗照进来，照亮贴在玻璃上的彩色皱纹纸。窗下平台摆满盆栽植物。树枝间栖着兔子和猛禽的标本，掩映在绿叶和藤蔓之中。窗下排列着小画架。角落里放着一箱玩具，供年幼孩子走神时玩耍。窗户对面的墙边，一只刷成浅蓝色的大木柜装着成排小抽屉，每个都仔细标着内容——水彩盒、墨汁、丙烯颜料、画笔、调色盘、玻璃杯、蜡笔、铅笔、橡皮、陶艺工具等。柜顶上，一个玻璃大鱼缸里游着凸眼的金鱼。

Students ranging in age from five to ten sat around tables pushed into a large rectangle at the center of the room. Teenagers who had once studied with Teacher Zhao occasionally came back, especially during school holidays, to work on projects. Parents who wanted to stay and watch sat in chairs along two of the walls. Teacher Zhao bounded around the classroom. She knelt next to young students to view drawings from their vantage point. When older students grew tired with their work, she imitated them by whining like a teenager, making light of their complaints. She jumped up on top of the tables with her camera to take photos of the students, which she announced she would "keep as souvenirs." She played tapes of classical and jazz music, and sometimes the Beatles, from a boom box on top of a bookshelf. But she also didn't hesitate to keep order in a way that reinforced a link between "culture" and "quality." When children started to talk too loudly or make a mess, she reprimanded them by asking, "Don't you have any culture? How can you act like that? Does your family have culture or not?" Teacher Zhao's investment in the development of young artists didn't preclude disciplining their parents. If the adults started to talk among themselves, she shushed them as if they were children. During a field trip to a foreign-managed contemporary art gallery, she insisted that it was already too late to teach parent chaperones how to properly view art. She made them wait outside the gallery while she instructed the children how to behave—they should stand, not squat, and quietly discuss the paintings from a distance without touching them—and then took them in to tour the exhibit.

五到十岁的学生围坐在教室中央拼成大长方形的桌子旁。曾经跟赵老师学画的少年有时会回来，尤其是在学校假期，来做作品。想留下来观看的家长坐在靠两面墙的椅子上。赵老师在教室里蹦来蹦去。她跪在年幼学生旁边，从他们的视角看画。年长学生画累了，她就学着少年的样子撒娇抱怨，把他们的牢骚当玩笑。她跳上桌子，用相机给学生拍照，并宣布要“留作纪念”。她用书架上的手提音响播放古典乐、爵士乐，有时还有披头士。但她也会毫不犹豫地维持秩序，方式强化着“文化”与“素质”之间的联系。孩子开始太大声说话或弄得一团糟时，她责问：“你们有没有文化？怎么能这样？你们家到底有没有文化？”赵老师对培养年轻艺术家的投入，并不妨碍她管教家长。大人们自己聊起来时，她会像对孩子一样嘘他们。在一次去外资当代艺术画廊的参观活动中，她坚持说，现在教陪同家长如何正确看艺术已经太晚了。她让他们在画廊外等着，自己先教孩子该怎么做——站着，不要蹲着，隔着距离安静讨论画作，不要触摸——然后才带他们进去参观。

After I had attended her class for several months, Teacher Zhao finally found time in her busy schedule to talk with me about her teaching philosophy. During the conversation, she emphasized the need to cultivate children's creativity and imagination, by exposing them to as many different styles and ways of making art as possible, instead of subjecting them to a rigid, test-based model of education. In her classes, she taught traditional Chinese arts, such as mask painting, the folk art of dough sculpture, seal carving, and calligraphy, as well as introducing Western techniques and "great works." She credited her pedagogical openness to opportunities to travel abroad, many arranged in conjunction with exhibits of work by her husband, a painter represented by the gallery her students had visited on their field trip. During these trips, she tried to learn as much as possible about art, design, architecture, and educational methods outside of China. She stressed, however, that Chinese students were subjected to greater discipline, because of crowded classroom conditions, and therefore knew how to work harder than the American students she had observed. She insisted, for example, that the practice of copying from models (linmo) was essential to Chinese art education.

我上她的课几个月后，赵老师终于在繁忙日程中抽出时间，和我谈她的教学理念。谈话中，她强调要培养孩子的创造力和想象力，让他们接触尽可能多的风格和创作方式，而不是让他们服从僵化、以考试为基础的教育模式。在她的课上，她教中国传统艺术，如面具彩绘、面塑、篆刻和书法，也介绍西方技法和“名作”。她把自己在教学上的开放归功于出国旅行的机会，其中许多是配合她丈夫的作品展安排的；丈夫是一位由她学生参观的那家画廊代理的画家。这些旅行中，她尽可能多地学习中国以外的艺术、设计、建筑和教育方法。但她强调，由于教室拥挤，中国学生受到更多纪律约束，因此比她在美国观察到的学生更懂得用功。例如，她坚持认为临摹（linmo）对中国美术教育至关重要。

She then told me, with great enthusiasm, about a new teaching method she'd been developing and would soon implement in her classroom. It would combine the Communist file (dang'an) system of tracking citizens' backgrounds with what she called American mba management style, referring to the growing popularity in China of programs that trained students in international business strategies and norms. Similar to dang'an—the closed records kept by work units on their members' political standing, work and family history, achievements, and failings—files would be created for all of her students. Over the years, she would add examples of their work as a record of their artistic progress. Her classroom archives, unlike those maintained by work unit officials, would be open, making the system akin to mba-style management, with its techniques of self-discipline and governance.[50] Students would be able to evaluate their own work over time but also look at the files of other students in order to compare and monitor their progress.

接着，她满怀热情地向我讲述一种她正在开发、即将在教室实施的新教学方法。它将把共产党追踪公民背景的档案（dang'an）制度，与她所谓的美国 MBA 管理风格结合起来——后者指中国日益流行的、训练学生掌握国际商业策略与规范的项目。与档案类似——单位保存的关于成员政治立场、工作与家庭历史、成绩与缺点的封闭记录——她将为所有学生建立档案。多年间，她会加入他们的作品样本，作为艺术进步的记录。她的教室档案不同于单位官员保存的档案，将是公开的，使这一体系类似 MBA 式管理及其自我规训与治理技术。[50] 学生既能评估自己长期以来的作品，也能查看其他学生的档案，以比较和监测进度。

In February 2002, I attended another field trip arranged by Teacher Zhao, a visit to linmo at an exhibit of prints by Pablo Picasso. I arrived on a cold, sunny Sunday morning at the China Millennium Monument, an imposing concrete structure, built next to the Military Museum to commemorate China's entry into the twenty-first century. A wide stone walkway gradually ascended almost three hundred meters along a north-south axis from the street to the museum's main entrance. Inscriptions on a ribbon of bronze, running down the middle of the walkway, record historical events from five thousand years of Chinese history. The monument itself is a circular construction modeled after the shape of an ancient sundial. On the night that Jiang Zemin announced Beijing had won its bid to host the 2008 Olympics, he addressed the nation on television from the steps of the Millennium Monument. I walked under a huge banner featuring a black-and-white photograph of Picasso's leathery face and entered the museum.

2002 年 2 月，我参加了赵老师安排的另一次参观活动，去中华世纪坛的毕加索版画展临摹。那是一个寒冷晴朗的周日上午，我来到中华世纪坛。这座气势逼人的混凝土建筑建于军事博物馆旁，纪念中国进入 21 世纪。宽阔的石质步道沿南北轴线从街道缓缓上升近三百米，通向博物馆正门。步道中央一条青铜带上的铭文，记录中国五千年历史上的事件。世纪坛本身是仿古代日晷形状的圆形建筑。江泽民宣布北京赢得 2008 年奥运会主办权的那一夜，他就站在世纪坛台阶上向全国发表电视讲话。我从一幅印有毕加索皮革般面孔黑白照片的巨大横幅下走过，进入博物馆。

In the lobby, children's linmo drawings of prints in the exhibit covered the walls. At a sales booth, parents could buy large sheets of drawing paper printed with the motto of the exhibit: "The master paints, I also paint." Children filled the large gallery space, where they sat on small stools and carefully copied Picasso drawings of animals, bullfights, and opera scenes. After Teacher Zhao's students had finished several drawings, she gathered them around a diorama of Picasso at a table filled with printmaking tools. A green compact car stood on a raised pedestal behind the display. Only at this point did I realize that the French carmaker Citroën was the main sponsor of the exhibit. Citroën and Dongfeng Motor, a Chinese auto company, had recently launched a new car for the Chinese market, the Picasso, a four-door hatchback with the artist's signature emblazoned on its side (figure 1.06). Teacher Zhao explained to her students how to use the different printmaking tools laid out on the table. She then instructed the students, as well as their parents, in the business of art. She stressed the point that art is purchasable, a recurring theme in her classroom (figure 1.07). To become a collector, one could start small and learn through practice how to evaluate the worth of a work. She distributed a handout with questions about the exhibit for the students to fill out. One question asked how much they would be willing to spend for one of the Picasso prints. She had asked them a similar question during their field trip to the foreign-managed commercial art gallery several months earlier and was dismayed when they gave unreasonably low prices. When the students handed in their papers this time, she smiled at their progress. Most of them had listed amounts in the one thousand to ten thousand yuan range.

大厅里，展厅版画的儿童临摹作品贴满墙壁。在销售台，家长可以买到印有展览口号的大张画纸："大师画，我也画。"孩子们挤满巨大的展厅，坐在小凳子上仔细临摹毕加索画的动物、斗牛和歌剧场景。赵老师的学生画完几幅后，她把大家召集到一个场景模型旁：毕加索坐在一张摆满版画工具的桌边。展示装置后的升高基座上停着一辆绿色小型汽车。直到此时我才意识到，法国汽车制造商雪铁龙是展览的主要赞助商。雪铁龙与中国汽车公司东风汽车最近为中国市场推出一款新车"毕加索"，这是一辆四门掀背车，车身侧面印着艺术家的签名（图 1.06）。赵老师向学生讲解如何使

用桌上摆放的各种版画工具。随后，她向学生和家长讲授艺术生意。她强调艺术是可购买的，这是她课堂上反复出现的主题（图 1.07）。要成为收藏家，可以从小的开始，通过实践学习如何评估作品价值。她发了一份关于展览的问卷让学生填写。其中一个问题问他们愿意花多少钱买一幅毕加索版画。几个月前参观那家外资商业画廊时，她问过类似问题，当时他们对价格估得低得不合理，令她沮丧。这次学生交回问卷时，她对他们的进步笑了。大多数人填的金额在一千到一万元之间。

The painter, aged seven, created this self-portrait from a photograph his parents had taken of him sitting with a Ronald McDonald statue at the popular chain restaurant in Beijing. He had, on his own initiative, evaluated his work by painting a price on it.

As the students and their parents dispersed, Teacher Zhao's husband arrived and said, "Let's go drive one of the cars!" In a large paved area outside the museum, Dongfeng Citroën employees ran a test-drive center. Zhao's husband left his driver's license at the registration table, and we climbed into a Picasso. As we slowly circled the monument, Teacher Zhao commented that the car was too expensive for the general market, but nonetheless would be great for driving students around because it had three seats across in the back. She then launched into a description of a kindergarten she hoped to open using the German Waldorf method that incorporates art and music in all aspects of the curriculum. I laughed, noting how Picasso had become such a profitable commodity. Teacher Zhao looked over her shoulder from the front seat with an incredulous look and said, "Of course, that's exactly what he was. He painted too many paintings over the course of his life, so none of them are really very precious!"

学生和家长散去时，赵老师的丈夫来了，说："我们去开一圈车吧！"博物馆外一大片铺砌场地上，东风雪铁龙员工经营着试驾中心。赵老师的丈夫把驾照留在登记台，我们坐进一辆"毕加索"。我们缓缓绕世纪坛行驶，赵老师评论说这车对普通市场来说太贵，但接送学生很棒，因为后排有三座。接着，她谈起希望用德国华德福教育法开办一所幼儿园，把艺术和音乐融入课程的所有方面。我笑了，指出毕加索如何成了如此有利可图的商品。赵老师从前排转过头，露出难以置信的表情说："当然，他本来就是。他一生画了太多画，所以没有一幅真正珍贵！"

I often heard Teacher Zhao speak disapprovingly of students' parents who drove expensive foreign cars or invited her out to elaborate meals but never considered purchasing art. Over time, some parents took her criticism to heart. One mother told me, without a hint of irony, that since she'd grown up during the Cultural Revolution she had never learned what culture really was. Even though she had succeeded financially in recent years, she feared this deficit would hold her back. As a result, she was determined to invest in her daughter's cultural education; she believed it would provide their family an entrée to the world that money alone couldn't buy. Teacher Zhao's enthusiasm for the Picasso car differed from the conspicuous consumption she criticized because she framed it in terms of how she would use the car to further her ideal of art education. Linmo exercises at the Millennium Monument Picasso exhibit educated Chinese children in the internationally recognized artwork of a modern Western master, while also teaching them art is a commodity, but one requiring specialized knowledge in order to properly evaluate it. The Little Turnip Head statue at the Children's Center once modeled a culture of socialist sacrifice; transvalued through suzhi jiaoyu, he now climbed the cultural ladder in order to guarantee the nation's global future.

我常听赵老师不满地谈起一些学生家长：他们开昂贵的外国车，或请她去豪华饭局，却从不考虑购买艺术。久而久之，一些家长把她的批评听进去了。一位母亲毫不讽刺地告诉我，她成长于文革，从没学过文化究竟是什么。尽管这些年经济上成功了，她仍担心这种缺失会拖累自己。因此，她决心投资女儿的文化教育；她相信这能为家庭提供一张仅靠金钱买不到的进入世界的门票。赵老师对毕加索汽车的热情，与她批评的炫耀性消费不同，因为她把它框定为如何用这辆车推进自己的艺术教育理想。在世纪坛毕加索展上的临摹练习，教中国孩子认识一位现代西方大师获得国际认可的作品，同时也教他们艺术是一种商品，但需要专门知识才能正确评估。儿童中心的小萝卜头雕像曾塑造一种社会主义牺牲文化；经素质教育而价值转换，如今他正在爬文化的梯子，以确保国家的全球未来。

Chinese artists who were once xianfeng by traveling to rural and ethnic minority hinterlands to represent village life gradually became avant-garde by participation in international art exhibitions. This transition occurred simultaneously with an increased flow of rural migrants to the city, leading to crossings and comparisons between the two groups. In the 1990s, rural migrants from Anhui, Henan, Xinjiang, and Zhejiang Provinces set up "villages" (cun), places of long-term residence and often manufacturing and commercial businesses, in outlying areas of Beijing.[51] In a smaller-scale movement, hundreds of artists flocked to the capital and developed what became known as the Yuanmingyuan artist village. In an area near the imperial summer palace to the city's northwest, they found living and working spaces cheap and easy to rent without a Beijing residence permit. Those who likened their circumstances to migrant workers or whose art began to focus on this new social group sometimes referred to themselves as mangliu (blind floaters), the often derogatory term used for rural migrants.[52] Or they invoked the romantic term jianghu, the wandering bandits from martial arts genres, who live by a code of loyalty to their sworn brothers and commitment to helping the needy.

曾经作为先锋（xianfeng）、前往农村和少数民族腹地再现乡村生活的中国艺术家，后来通过参加国际艺术展而逐渐成为前卫。这一转型与农村移民涌入城市同时发生，导致两个群体之间的交错与比较。20 世纪 90 年代，来自安徽、河南、新疆和浙江的农村移民在北京边缘地区建立“村”（cun），作为长期居住地，也常常是制造和商业经营之地。[51] 在一场规模较小的运动中，数百名艺术家涌向首都，发展出后来所称的圆明园艺术家村。在西北方向皇家园囿附近，他们发现没有北京户口也能廉价、容易地租到生活和工作空间。那些把自己的处境比作农民工、或其艺术开始关注这一新社会群体的人，有时自称“盲流”（mangliu）——常用于农村移民的贬义词。[52] 或者他们援引浪漫的“江湖”一词，指武侠类型中的游侠，他们遵循对结义兄弟的忠诚和扶危济困的准则。

While some who took up residence in Yuanmingyuan came from Beijing, many migrated from other provinces, attracted by stories they'd heard about the artist village. The community attracted increasing attention from foreign art collectors and reporters, and Chinese authorities grew wary of this activity and its proximity to key universities as a threat to state cultural control. During a "clean up and reordering" campaign that hit Beijing in 1995, rural migrant and artist villages both experienced police surveillance and eviction. Shi Tou, one of the few female artists at Yuanmingyuan, connected the crackdown to Beijing's preparation to host the UN Fourth World Conference on Women that September. In a documentary film on China's emerging lesbian community and its intertwining with transnational feminist and queer activism, she recounts: "At that time, Yuanmingyuan was an art village with a free atmosphere, it had connections with people from all over the world and represented the most pioneering [xianfeng] part of that era. Maybe they were afraid artists from Yuanmingyuan would contact international attendees.... Yuanmingyuan was turbulent and restless in 1995. There were armed police from the security department patrol around all the time, from day to night."[53] Bulldozers hit rural migrant compounds, reducing thriving neighborhoods to rubble. While the Yuanmingyuan village was spared physical destruction, artists caught in the sweep there were arrested and fined for illegal residence. Police took those unable to pay the fines to rural locations to do road repairs or other physical labor to work off their debt.

在圆明园定居的人有些来自北京，但许多是从其他省份迁来的，被听到的艺术家村故事吸引。这个社区越来越引起外国艺术收藏家和记者的注意，中国当局开始警惕这类活动，以及它与重点大学的邻近，认为其威胁国家的文化控制。1995 年北京“清理整顿”运动中，农村移民村和艺术家村都遭到警方监视和驱逐。圆明园为数不多的女性艺术家之一石头，把这次镇压与北京筹备当年 9 月联合国第四次世界妇女大会联系起来。在一部关于中国新兴女同性恋群体及其与跨国女性主义和酷儿行动主义交织的纪录片中，她讲述：“那时，圆明园是一个有自由气氛的艺术村，它和世界各地的人有联系，代表了那个时代最先锋（xianfeng）的部分。也许他们怕圆明园艺术家接触国际与会者……1995 年的圆明园动荡不安。安全部门的武警从早到晚不停巡逻。”[53] 推土机开进民工聚居区，把繁荣社区夷为瓦砾。圆明园村虽免于实体摧毁，但扫荡中被抓的艺术家因非法居留而被逮捕、罚款。警方把付不起罚款的人送到农村修路或做其他体力劳动抵债。

The police had already disbanded another artist village east of Beijing's third ring road the year before. Residents had dubbed it East Village, suggesting a comparison with New York's lower east side.[54] Their activities, especially nude performance pieces by artists Ma Liuming and Zhang Huan, quickly attracted official scrutiny. Artists began moving further east to Tongzhou, a rural county of Hebei Province annexed in 1997 to the Beijing municipal area. Artists lived throughout the county in a variety of housing, ranging from apartment blocks to basic rural courtyard houses to walled compounds with contemporary interiors. The largest group congregated in Songzhuang, where they rented houses and land from famers and transformed the area. Ten years after the police sweep of Yuanmingyuan, the official website for Tongzhou District prominently featured the Songzhuang Artist Village. It boasted that with over five hundred artists, the village constituted the world's largest art community.[55] The first annual Songzhuang Art Festival began in 2005, followed a year later by the opening of the Songzhuang Art Museum. State surveillance of artist villages shifted to culture industry incorporation of them. In 2012, the Tongzhou District government commissioned Sasaki Associates, an architectural firm headquartered in Boston, to create a four-thousand-hectare plan for the Songzhuang Arts and Agricultural City.[56]

前一年，警方已解散北京三环路以东的另一个艺术家村。居民称之为东村，暗示与纽约下东区的比较。[54] 他们的活动，尤其是艺术家马六明和张洹的裸体行为作品，很快招来官方审查。艺术家开始进一步向东迁移，前往通州——原属河北的农业县，1997 年划归北京市区。艺术家住在全县各处，住房从公寓楼、简陋农家院到内部装修现代的院墙院落不等。最大的群体聚集在宋庄，他们向农民租房租地，改变了这个地区。警方扫荡圆明园十年后通州区官方网站突出展示宋庄艺术家村。网站夸耀说，这里拥有五百多位艺术家，构成世界最大的艺术社区。[55] 2005 年首届宋庄艺术节开幕，一年后宋庄美术馆开馆。国家对艺术家村的监视，转变为文化产业对它们的收编。2012 年，通州区政府委托总部在波士顿的建筑事务所佐佐木事务所，为宋庄艺术农业城制定四千公顷规划。[56]

During the early 2000s, the financial circumstances of artists in this and other semirural border areas of Beijing diverged to extremes of wealth and poverty. Many nonetheless felt they had escaped regimented city life for a more carefree and collective existence in the countryside. As they educated themselves about international art trends and worked to cultivate connections and organize exhibits in the city, they expressed nostalgic attachment to a pastoral way of life on the verge of vanishing. Some criticized the environmental impact of rapid urbanization, especially as real estate developments encroached on the fields and outdoor markets of Tongzhou, and sympathized with the treatment of rural migrants working in the city. An artist from Shaanxi Province, who was involved with environmental protection groups, told me the saddest moment in recent history for him occurred in 1999 when the government evicted migrant workers in another mass sweep before the official celebration of the prc's fiftieth anniversary.

21 世纪初，这个地区以及其他北京半乡村边缘地带的艺术家，经济状况分化到贫富两极。尽管如此，许多人仍觉得自己逃离了被管制的城市生活，来到乡村过更无忧无虑的集体生活。他们学习国际艺术潮流，努力在城市里培养关系、组织展览，同时对一种濒临消失的田园生活方式表达怀旧依恋。一些人批评快速城市化的环境影响，尤其是房地产开发侵占通州的田地和露天市场，并同情在城市工作的农村移民的遭遇。一位参与环保团体的陕西艺术家告诉我，他记忆中近来最悲伤的时刻是 1999 年：政府为庆祝中华人民共和国成立五十周年，在另一场大规模清查中驱逐了农民工。

Cultural critic Wang Min'an describes this identification with country folk in a way that reveals gendered assumptions about this bohemian ideal: "The group of artists in Songzhuang reside mixed together with peasants.... In appearance, they resemble each other: long messy hair, shiny shaved heads, unkempt beards, and long khaki pants."[57] Wang hints at the false promise that such mingling will provide escape from urban commercialism, remarking that these artists often spend their evenings in the city: "They turn the wheels of their cars in the opposite direction of the rest of the city, and for a handful of coins, the backdrop of their nights often includes large quantities of wine, one or two fashionable girls, and the dim lights of a bar."[58] The artists' challenge to the city as the new national object of desire also slid into romanticization of the rural. The countryside became a commodified form of urban leisure, an "artistic lifestyle" urbanites strove to emulate as Tongzhou artists' houses began appearing in home decorating magazines.

文化批评家汪民安在描述这种对乡民的认同时，透露出关于这一波西米亚理想的性别化假设："宋庄的艺术家群体与农民混住在一起……从外表看，他们彼此相像：长而凌乱的头发、闪亮的光头、不修边幅的胡子、卡其色长裤。"[57] 汪民安暗示，这种混杂会提供逃离城市商业主义的虚假承诺，并指出这些艺术家常在城里度过夜晚："他们把车轮转向与城市其他人相反的方向；用几个硬币，他们夜晚的背景常常包括大量酒、一两个时髦姑娘和酒吧昏暗的灯光。"[58] 艺术家把城市当作新的国家欲望对象来挑战，同时也滑向对乡村的浪漫化。乡村成为城市休闲的商品化形式，一种城市人竞相模仿的"艺术化生活方式"，通州艺术家的房子开始出现在家居装饰杂志上。

During this reconfiguration of rural-urban relations, a number of Beijing artists began making pieces focused on male migrant workers (mingong) employed in the city's many construction sites. When I interviewed ten artists involved in such projects, several told me they'd first come in contact with mingong while remodeling their homes and later hired them to appear in or assist with artworks. As they attempted to collaborate with and represent migrant workers in sculptural, photographic, and performance works, they saw them as emblematic of new forms of social inequality. A piece by the Gao Brothers that staged nude workers embracing against a concrete urban landscape incited criticism in Meishu (Fine arts), the official publication of the Chinese Artists Association.[59] An article in an issue commemorating the sixtieth anniversary of Mao's "Talks at the Yan'an Conference on Art and Literature" lambasted this trend: "These so-called avant-garde artists not only long ago completely dispensed with the lofty aim of serving the people, but they have started to turn it utterly upside down, using workers and peasants as art's 'new material' or 'new medium' so that the 'people' pay out their flesh to serve their 'avant-garde' art."[60]

在这种城乡关系重构中，一些北京艺术家开始创作聚焦在城里众多建筑工地受雇的男性民工（mingong）的作品。我访谈了十位参与此类项目的艺术家，其中几位告诉我，他们最初是在装修房屋时接触民工的，后来雇用他们出镜或协助创作。他们尝试在雕塑、摄影和行为作品中与民工合作并再现民工，把民工视为新社会不平等形式的象征。高氏兄弟一件让裸体工人相拥于混凝土城市景观前的作品，在中国美术家协会官方刊物《美术》上引发批评。[59] 一篇文章刊于纪念毛泽东《在延安文艺座谈会上的讲话》发表六十周年专号，猛烈抨击这一潮流："这些所谓前卫艺术家不仅早已彻底抛弃了为人民服务的崇高目标，而且开始把它完全颠倒过来，把工农当作艺术的'新材料'或'新媒介'，让'人民'用自己的血肉之躯来服务于他们的'前卫'艺术。"[60]

I also interviewed a migrant worker who had served as artist assistant for Zhang Dali's 100 Chinese (figure 1.08), a sculptural installation of busts cast from the heads of migrant workers.[61] When Wang arrived in Beijing from Henan Province, he worked for several sculptors, as a handyman, model, and eventually apprentice. He learned the technical skills of the trade and had executed conceptual ideas by several successful contemporary artists. For 100 Chinese, he recruited friends, relatives, and neighbors in the rural migrant enclave where he lived and helped develop the process of casting their heads in plaster. Sitters kept their eyes shut and breathed through straws inserted into their nostrils for the ten minutes the plaster took to harden. The resin heads then created from these original casts bear the individual features of each sitter, as well as the frozen, closed-eye, pinched-lip facial expressions exacted by the process. Zhang Dali exhibited them in piles, lined up on shelves, or stacked in individual plexiglass boxes, a mute collection of severed heads. A catalogue of Zhang's work produced by a British gallery contains the following description: "His latest work is a documentation of faces—faces of the migrant workers who flock to the big cities in search of a job. These people are desperately poor and are usually seeking only to survive. They are not part of the official register of inhabitants and thus have no right to state education, health care or other benefits. There are the fringes of society. They live on the outskirts of major cities, making meager homes in abandoned buildings."[62] Zhang emphasized in the interview I conducted with him the collective striving of mingong and society's callous disregard for them as something he identified with as an artist who had lived in Yuanmingyuan and floated around the city in the 1990s as a graffiti artist.[63]

我还访谈了一位曾为张大力的《一百个中国人》担任艺术家助手的民工（图 1.08）。这是一件用民工头部翻制的半身像组成的雕塑装置。[61] 当王从河南来到北京时，他为几位雕塑家工作，做过杂

工、模特，最终成为学徒。他学会了这一行业的技术，也替几位成功的当代艺术家实现过概念构想。为创作《一百个中国人》，他在自己居住的民工聚居区招募朋友、亲戚和邻居，并帮助开发用石膏翻制他们头部的流程。模特们闭上眼睛，通过插入鼻孔的吸管呼吸，石膏需要十分钟硬化。随后用这些原始模具翻制出的树脂头像，带有每个模特的面部特征，也带有流程强加的凝固、闭眼、抿嘴表情。张大力把它们成堆摆放、在架子上排开，或分别堆叠在有机玻璃盒中——一组沉默的断头收藏。一家英国画廊制作的张大力作品图录有这样的描述：“ 他最新的作品是一份面孔记录——涌向大城市找工作的民工的面孔。这些人极度贫困，通常只求生存。他们不在官方户籍登记中，因而无权享受国家教育、医疗或其他福利。他们处于社会边缘。他们住在大城市郊区，在废弃建筑中搭建简陋的住所。”[62] 在我对张大力进行的访谈中，他强调民工的集体奋斗和社会对他们的冷漠无视，作为一位曾住在圆明园、90 年代在城市里游荡的涂鸦艺术家，他对此深有认同。[63]

As Wang and two other friends whose heads had been cast for Zhang’s piece chatted about the process, they shared stories and examples of their own artistic endeavors. Their small, two-room flat in a low one-story brick building with a metal roof was filled with landscape paintings in oil and watercolor, as well as small abstract and figurative sculptures. Wang’s girlfriend who worked at an advertising company used her spare time and money to take art classes in design and painting. She spoke of how art provided her with a space of focus, challenge, and creative energy but also of the pain of being judged by people in the city, even by her painting teacher, as someone simply from the countryside. Describing it as feeling caught between two existences, she ran to the other room and pulled a piece of paper off the wall. The quote copied on it came from a book, translated from English, she had recently read: “It is a peculiar sensation, this double-consciousness, that only lets him see himself through the revelation of the other world. It is a peculiar sensation, this double-consciousness, this sense of always looking at one’s self through the eyes of others, of measuring one’s soul by the tape of a world that looks on in amused contempt and pity.”[64] These words, written by W. E. B. Du Bois almost a century earlier, helped her navigate the splintering condition of daily life in Beijing. They spoke of art as decolonial method: a means of becoming, in Du Bois’s words, “co-creators in the kingdom of culture.”[65]

当王和另外两位头被翻制的朋友聊起这个流程时，他们分享了自己的艺术尝试和故事。他们位于低矮单层铁皮顶砖楼里的两居室小公寓，摆满了油画和水彩风景画，以及小型抽象和具象雕塑。王的女友在一家广告公司工作，用业余时间和钱上设计与绘画课。她谈起艺术如何为她提供专注、挑战和创造能量的空间，也谈到被城市人——甚至她的绘画老师——仅仅视为“乡下人”的痛苦。她说自己感觉被夹在两种存在之间，然后跑到另一间屋，从墙上扯下一张纸。纸上抄录的话出自她最近读的一本从英文译成中文的书：“这是一种奇特的感觉，这种双重意识，总是通过另一个世界的揭示来看自己。这是一种奇特的感觉，这种双重意识，总是透过他人的眼睛看自己，用一个带着讥讽的轻蔑与同情的世界的尺子来衡量自己的灵魂。”[64] 这些由 W. E. B. 杜波依斯在近一个世纪前写下的文字帮助她应对北京日常生活分裂的状况。这些文字阐明了作为去殖民方法的艺术：成为杜波依斯所说的“文化王国中的共同创造者”的途径。[65]

By the turn of the twentieth century, the museum had become a worldly emblem of national modernity. In the West, public institutions assumed the art of exhibition as a form of civilizational distinction. World’s Fairs in Euro-American metropoles staged the world for the viewing public, displaying it in a way that naturalized a hierarchy of nations and races. Chinese reformers, in their encounters with such expositions, learned their exhibitory logic and potential to develop a modern, national consciousness and achieve international recognition. With these goals in mind, an official from Jiangsu Province began building the first Chinese museum in 1905. He aimed to transform the small town of Nantong, between Nanjing and Shanghai, into a model of modernity and self-governance. When the Nantong Museum opened in 1912 its buildings and gardens presented a range of objects—paintings, plants, skeletons, tools, industrial machines, furniture, and animals—displayed and classified under the categories of nature, history, and art.[66]

到 20 世纪初，博物馆已成为国家现代性的世界性象征。在西方，公共机构把展览艺术视为一种文明区隔形式。欧美大都市的世界博览会为观看公众上演世界，其展示方式使国家与种族的等级自然化。中国改革者在与这类博览会的相遇中，学会了它们的展览逻辑及其发展现代民族意识、获得国际承认的潜能。怀着这些目标，一位江苏官员于 1905 年开始建造中国第一座博物馆。他要把南京与上海之间的南通小城改造成现代性与自治的模范。1912 年南通博物苑开放时，其建筑和园林展示了一系列物品——绘画、植物、骨骼、工具、工业机械、家具和动物——按自然、历史和艺术分类陈列。[66]

The national and global legacy of exhibitory politics took on a new millennial life as China bid to host the 2008 Olympics and 2010 World Expo. Museum politics also structured the experiences of Chinese contemporary artists as they exhibited work abroad and at home. The artist Zhu Jia expressed with unsettling candor the dissonance he felt with being put on display. I first met Zhu while helping translate for a U.S.-based curator during his research visit to Beijing for an exhibit of non-Western contemporary art. Zhu Jia worked as a design editor at Beijing Youth News, the job assignment he received after graduating from the Central Academy of Fine Arts in 1988. Trained as an oil painter, he moved into photography and video. For Passage, a video installation just completed when we met in 2001, he pedaled a video camera strapped to the bed of worker's bicycle-drawn cart to film various routes through the city.[67] He projected these journeys onto three long vertical panels, the size and shape of traditional Chinese scrolls. The resulting montage of partial and disjunctive movement refuses a singular view of the city. Since the late 1990s, his work had been included in several international exhibits, but Zhu expressed misgivings about this attention. He told the visiting curator he suspected his nationality mattered more than his art, as curators sought third-world tokens. He described with chagrin a sense of alienation from Chinese audiences. China's underdeveloped museum system for contemporary art had pushed him to "go global," but the foreign narrative of surprise and discovery framing Chinese avant-garde art had become tiring. It accentuated the condition of being cut off from audiences who shared similar experiences of passage through Beijing's social and historical landscape.

展览政治的民族与全球遗产，在中国申办 2008 年奥运会和 2010 年世博会时获得了新的千禧年生命。博物馆政治也结构着中国当代艺术家在国内外展出的经验。艺术家朱加以令人不安的坦率，表达了自己被置于展示之中时感到的不协调。我最初遇到朱加，是在为一位常驻美国的策展人担任翻译时，他来北京考察，筹备一个非西方当代艺术展。朱加在《北京青年报》做设计编辑，这是 1988 年从中央美术学院毕业后分配的工作。他受的是油画家训练，后来转向摄影和录像。我们 2001 年见面时，他刚完成录像装置《通道》：他把摄像机绑在工人使用的自行车拖车车板上，自己蹬车拍摄穿越城市的各条路线。[67] 他把这些旅程投影在三块长竖屏上，尺寸和形状类似中国传统卷轴。由此产生的局部、断裂运动的蒙太奇，拒绝单一的城市视角。自 90 年代末以来，他的作品已参加若干国际展览，但朱加对这种关注表示疑虑。他告诉来访的策展人，他怀疑自己的国籍比艺术更重要，因为策展人寻求第三世界点缀。他懊恼地描述自己与中国观众的疏离感。中国不发达的当代艺术博物馆体系迫使他“走向全球”，但外国叙事以惊异与发现来框定中国前卫艺术，已令他厌倦。这加剧了他与观众相隔绝的状态——那些观众共享着穿越北京社会和历史景观的类似经验。

When I met with Zhu Jia several months later, the situation and his assessment of it had shifted.[68] He had recently returned from trips to Berlin and New York, where his work had showed in separate exhibits. Living in Time at Berlin's Hamburger Bahnhof Museum featured twenty-nine Chinese contemporary artists as part of China Fest, a showcase of Chinese culture sponsored by the Berlin Senate Administration for Science, Research and Culture and the State Council Information Office of the People's Republic of China. Zhu explained that the Chinese Ministry of Culture had originally suggested a show of early twentieth-century ink painters. Their German counterparts, however, insisted on contemporary art by young artists. The Chinese conceded, according to Zhu, because with their application to join the WTO still pending, they wanted to present a modern and moderate face.

几个月后我再见到朱加时，情况和他对情况的判断都变了。[68] 他刚从柏林和纽约回来，作品在那里的不同展览中展出。柏林汉堡火车站博物馆的《生活在此时》展出了二十九位中国当代艺术家，属于“中国节”的一部分；这个中国文化展示活动由柏林参议院科学、研究与文化部以及中华人民共和国国务院新闻办公室资助。朱加解释说，中国文化部最初建议展出 20 世纪初的水墨画家。德国方面却坚持要年轻艺术家的当代艺术。朱加说，中方让步了，因为当时加入世贸组织的申请仍待批准，他们想展现现代而温和的面貌。

The curators chosen for the show included Hou Hanru, a Chinese specialist in contemporary art living in Paris, and Fan Di'an, the vice president of the Central Academy of Fine Arts.[69] Of the artists they selected, roughly one-third had exhibited the previous year in a controversial show staged by Ai Weiwei to coincide with the 2000 Shanghai Biennale. The exhibit title in English, Fuck Off, reflected more blatantly Ai's in-your-face attitude than the Chinese title, Bu hezuo fangshi (Uncooperative approach).[70] The exhibit, together with several others containing artworks that used animals, blood, or human corpses, prompted the Ministry of Culture to issue a public memorandum about the illegality of artworks that "violate state laws, upset social order and damage people's mental and physical health."[71] Association with Fuck Off did not, however, prevent nine of its artists from being sponsored by the Ministry of Culture for an exhibition in Beijing's German sister city.[72]

展览选定的策展人包括旅居巴黎的中国当代艺术专家侯瀚如和中央美术学院副院长范迪安。[69] 在他们选出的艺术家中，大约三分之一参加了前一年艾未未为配合 2000 年上海双年展举办的有争议展览。展览英文标题 “Fuck Off” 比中文标题“不合作方式”（Bu hezuo fangshi）更直白地反映了艾未未肆无忌惮的态度。[70] 这个展览，连同其他几个包含使用动物、血液或人体尸体作品的展览，促使文化部发布公开通告，称“违反国家法律、扰乱社会秩序、损害人们身心健康”的艺术作品违法。[71] 然而，与“不合作方式”的关联并未阻止其中九位艺术家获得文化部赞助，参加在北京的德国姐妹城市举办的展览。[72]

Zhu Jia described experiencing profoundly mixed emotions during his trip to Berlin. He felt satisfaction that, for the first time ever, the Chinese government paid for his travel to an exhibit abroad. As the artists installed their pieces in the museum, Ministry of Culture officials came by to congratulate them on a successful show. With a sardonic smile, embarrassed by his own pleasure at the moment, Zhu said he had finally received the national recognition the patriotic education of his youth had taught him to desire. When the same officials spoke at a banquet after the opening about bringing the exhibit back to a museum in Beijing, Zhu judged their talk as a performance well suited for the moment. Not long after our conversation, however, two other Living in Time participants told a dinner gathering of artists that they'd heard it would open at the Millennium Monument in 2002. While they viewed this possibility as a good opportunity, they questioned their embrace of state institutionalization and launched into a discussion of the shifting cultural milieu.

朱加描述他在柏林之行中经历了极其复杂的情绪。他感到满足，因为这是中国政府第一次支付他出国参展的旅费。艺术家们在博物馆安装作品时，文化部官员前来祝贺他们展出成功。朱加带着讥讽的微笑，为自己的片刻喜悦感到尴尬；他说自己终于得到了少年时代爱国主义教育教他渴望的国家承认。同一批官员在开幕后的宴会上谈到要把展览带回北京一家博物馆时，朱加认为他们的讲话是适合当时场合的表演。然而，我们谈话后不久，另外两位《生活在此时》参展者在一个艺术家晚餐聚会上说，他们听说展览将于 2002 年在中华世纪坛开幕。他们把这看作好机会，却又质疑自己对国家制度化的拥抱，并展开关于文化环境变化的讨论。

As they ate and drank, they narrated a diagram of triangulation. In the immediate post-1989 geography of Chinese avant-garde art, the receiving or buying end was generally xifang (the West). Beijing buzzed with energy generated by the tension between a desiring West and an image-anxious Chinese state. The interplay between guanfang (Chinese officialdom) and xifang allowed for what they called minjian (popular or folk) activities.[73] As they held onto an idea of minjian as nonstate forms of social critique, they simultaneously struggled with anxieties of co-optation by increasing collaborations between xifang and guanfang, as in the Living in Time exhibit. While some believed in the development of local museums to bring Chinese contemporary art home, others worried that state institutionalization would limit their ability to creatively play xifang and guanfang off of each other, thereby shutting down cultural critique of both.

他们边吃边喝，讲述了一张三角关系的图式。在 1989 年之后的中国前卫艺术地理中，接收或购买的一端通常是“西方”（xifang）。北京充斥着由渴望的西方与形象焦虑的中国国家之间的张力所产生的能量。“官方”（guanfang）与“西方”之间的互动，为他们所谓的“民间”（minjian）活动提供了空间。[73] 他们一方面坚持民间作为非国家社会批判形式的观念，一方面又因西方与官方日益合作（如《生活在此时》展览）而焦虑被收编。有些人相信发展本地博物馆能把中国当代艺术带回家，另一些人则担心国家制度化会限制他们创造性地利用西方与官方之间矛盾的能力，从而关闭对两者的文化批判。

Another twist on the museum in Beijing appeared as real estate developers adopted the cultural capital of "world-class" art districts and museums as a branding strategy. soho China led the trend, becoming Beijing's largest real estate company and making its chairman Pan Shiyi and ceo Zhang Xin one of the nation's wealthiest power couples. The moma Modern Land Group cultivated an even more obvious connection between cosmopolitan art, architecture, and privatized housing by naming successive developments after New York's Museum of Modern Art. New York architect Steven Holl designed their Grand moma project, an award-winning complex of eight mixed-use towers linked by a sky ring completed in 2009.[74] When I visited the site in 2007, a sales associate took me on a "virtual" tour that included a presentation in front of an illuminated city map; passage through a corridor of vitrines displaying architectural models of the project; and a walk through a sample unit appointed with modernist furniture. At the end, I received a bag full of promotional materials.

博物馆在北京的另一种变体，出现在房地产开发商把“世界级”艺术区和博物馆的文化资本用作品牌策略之时。SOHO 中国引领这一潮流，成为北京最大的房地产公司，其董事长潘石屹和首席执行官张欣跻身全国最富有的权势夫妇。当代置业集团（MOMA）通过用纽约现代艺术博物馆为接连开发的项目命名，培养出世界主义艺术、建筑与私有化住房之间更明显的联系。纽约建筑师斯蒂文·霍尔设计了他们的当代 MOMA 项目，这是一个获奖的八座混合用途塔楼建筑群，由空中环廊连接，2009 年完工。[74] 2007 年我参观该楼盘时，一位销售带我“虚拟”看房：先在发光的城市地图前做介绍；再穿过陈列项目建筑模型的玻璃展柜走廊；然后走过一套布置现代主义家具的样板间。最后，我拿到一袋宣传材料。

A catalogue titled A City within a City opens by placing future architectural renderings of Beijing on par with other global cities.[75] An accompanying DVD features Steven Holl introducing the project. During a segment in which a Matisse painting cross-dissolves into a watercolor sketch of his Linked Hybrid design, Holl describes its location on the northeast corner of Beijing's Second Ring Road: "A place that, I say, is analogous to being on Fifth Avenue and Sixtieth Street at Central Park. We envision an open project, which is created in the spirit of a pedestrian community, being able to walk to all the functions of the base. But not only that, on the twentieth floor there is a ring, a sky ring, of additional functions that really create something utopian in a way, where one isn't just inhabiting an apartment. It's like inhabiting a new world."[76]

一本题为《城中城》的图录开篇，把北京未来的建筑效果图与其他全球城市并置。[75] 随附 DVD 中，斯蒂文·霍尔介绍这个项目。在一个片段里，马蒂斯一幅画渐变为他“连接复合体”设计的水彩草图，霍尔这样描述项目在北京二环路东北角的位置：“这个地方，我说，就像在第五大道和第六十街的中央公园。我们设想一个开放的项目，以步行社区的精神创造，能够步行抵达基地的所有功能。不仅如此，在二十层还有一个环，一个空中环廊，提供更多功能，真正在某种意义上创造出乌托邦式的东西，让人不只是住在一套公寓里。那就像住在一个新世界里。”[76]

The formal analogy of Holl's design sketch with Matisse's La Danse reinforces the global city and art image presented by the moma Modern Land Group (plate 5).[77] It also highlights the architectural qualities—movement, porosity, and luminosity—Holl discusses as central to his aesthetic. Holl explains the caption written at the top of the watercolor, "filmic urban space beijing": cinema serves "as an emblem" of his design. He describes the sky ring functioning like a film loop, and his design places a movie theater, imagined as a community gathering point, at its center. The animated rendering of this theater projects a scene from the 1934 Chinese silent film Goddess on its screen. The cinema design includes a porous wall so that the iconic face of the film's star Ruan Lingyu shines through to the building's exterior and reflects in the pool of water surrounding it. This invocation of Goddess as marketing device alienates the film from its roots in nascent socialist realism. Ruan Lingyu, herself a working-class girl catapulted to silver screen fame and scandal who committed suicide at the age of twenty-four, plays a prostitute consumed by predatory elements in colonial-era capitalist Shanghai. When rage borne of injustice drives her to murder, her glamorous façade, like that of the city, glimmers with revolutionary potential. In an analysis of the relationship between architecture and cinema in Holl's project James Tweedie writes, "But flickering on its walls and screen are several potentially conflicting conceptions of cinema, ranging from the age-old dream of a medium to document the political realities of the present to the desire for a museum-like medium that preserves the national past in all its spectacle and splendor."[78]

霍尔设计草图与马蒂斯《舞蹈》的形式类比，强化了当代置业集团所呈现的全球城市与艺术形象（图版 5）。[77] 它也突显了霍尔视为其美学核心的建筑特质——运动、通透与明亮。霍尔解释水彩画上方的文字“电影般的城市空间：北京”：电影“作为其设计的象征”。他说空中环廊像电影循环一样运作，设计把一座被视为社区聚会点的电影院放在中心。这座影院的动画效果图在银幕上投射 1934 年中国默片《神女》的场景。影院设计包括一面通透的墙，使影片明星阮玲玉的标志性面孔透到建筑外墙，并倒映在环绕建筑的水池中。把《神女》调用为营销手段，使影片脱离其早期社会主义现实主义的根源。阮玲玉本人是从工人阶级女孩一跃成为银幕明星并卷入丑闻、二十四岁自杀身亡的人，她在影片中扮演一个在殖民时代资本主义上海被掠夺性力量吞噬的妓女。当不公带来的愤怒驱使她杀人时，她光鲜的外表，像这座城市一样，闪烁着革命潜能。詹姆斯·特威迪在分析霍尔项目中建筑与电影的关系时写道：“但在它的墙壁和银幕上闪烁的，是几种可能相互冲突的电影观念，从记录当下政治现实的媒介这一由来已久的梦想，到渴望一种类似博物馆的媒介，以其全部的奇观与辉煌保存民族的过去。”[78]

Many artists at the turn of the millennium viewed state-controlled institutions like the National Art Museum of China as retrograde and actively explored alternative exhibition venues. New art centers within commodity apartment real estate developments offered one possibility. They served as a medium ground between public and private within construction sites of dream and upheaval. Xing Danwen, Central Academy of Fine Arts graduate and photographer of the East Village art scene in the mid-1990s, examined conflicting conceptions of display in her series Backstage and Urban Fiction. Taken together, they probe the linkage between state commissioning of international star architects to design Beijing's capital monuments, the ubiquitous visual imagery of architectural models, and the labor and lived experience behind the aesthetics of China's new urbanism. The color photographs of Backstage record in documentary detail the construction site of the National Grand Theater designed by Paul Andreu. An image from above surveys the scale of the project, with the Great Hall of the People pushed to its edge, while others focus on the life of rural migrant workers on site: rows of portable toilets, a metal rice bowl on dirt ground. Urban Fiction captures instead the gendered alienation, ennui, and violence of new privatized forms of dwelling. For this series, created from 2004 to 2009, Xing photographed architectural scale models created for real estate developments. She then digitally edited the photographs to add isolated scenes so small the viewer has to search to find them. The characters in the scenes are all Xing dressed in different roles: an office worker on the phone gazing out the window, a woman floating alone in a villa swimming pool, a woman about to jump from the roof of a high-rise, a fleeing bride in the plaza of a planned community.

世纪之交的许多艺术家认为中国美术馆这类国家控制的机构落后，并积极探索替代性展览场所。商品房房地产开发项目中的新艺术中心提供了一种可能。它们在梦想与动荡的工地中，充当公私之间的中间地带。邢丹文是中央美院毕业生，也是 90 年代中期东村艺术现场的摄影者，她在《后台》和《都市演义》系列中考察相互冲突的展示观念。合在一起，它们探究国家委托国际明星建筑师设计北京首都纪念碑、无处不在的建筑模型视觉图像，以及中国新城市主义美学背后的劳动与生活经验之间的联系。《后台》的彩色照片以纪实细节记录保罗·安德鲁设计的国家大剧院工地。一张俯拍照片呈现项目规模，人民大会堂被挤到画面边缘；其他照片聚焦工地上农村移民的生活：成排的移动厕所、泥地上的金属饭盆。《都市演义》则捕捉新私有化居住形式中性别化的疏离、倦怠与暴力。这个系列创作于 2004 年至 2009 年，邢丹文拍摄为房地产开发项目制作的建筑模型，再用数码方式编辑照片，加入孤立的小场景，小到观者必须寻找才能发现。场景中的人物都由邢丹文扮演，穿着不同角色：一位打电话的上班族凝视窗外，一位独自漂浮在别墅泳池中的女人，一位正要跳下高楼屋顶的女人，一位在规划社区广场上逃跑的新娘。

Within the soho China scale model a woman in a purple wig and sunglasses stands with her hands raised in shock. Her top has been ripped open. On the pristine white floor before her lie a bloody cleaver, the body of a white male in a pool of blood, and a scattered bouquet of flowers (plates 6 and 7). In the Grand moma model, a woman walking two daschunds through the sky ring is about to collide with a female window washer in a blue uniform. That Xing herself embodies both characters highlights the contradictory role of Chinese contemporary artists caught between historical registers, as cultural workers who endeavor to represent “the people” or the nation’s arrival as a cosmopolitan player. The replication and manipulation of the artist’s own image highlight how vanguard visions of inhabiting a new world depend on gendered imagery. The dancing nude, the treaty-port prostitute, the rosy-cheeked young pioneer, the market-reform lady of leisure pile up at the doors to the kingdom of culture.

在 SOHO 中国模型里，一个戴紫色假发和墨镜的女人双手惊举。她的上衣被撕开。她面前洁白的地板上有一把带血的菜刀、一具躺在血泊中的白人男性尸体和散落的花束（图版 6、7）。在当代 MOMA 模型里，一个牵着两只腊肠犬走过空中环廊的女人，即将与一位穿蓝色制服的女性擦窗工相撞。邢丹文自己扮演两个角色，突显中国当代艺术家夹在历史层次之间的矛盾角色：作为文化工作者，他们努力再现“人民”，或再现国家作为世界主义玩家的抵达。对艺术家自身形象的复制与操纵，突显了栖居新世界的前卫愿景如何依赖性别化图像。跳舞的裸女、通商口岸的妓女、脸颊红润的年轻先锋队员、改革年代的休闲女士，堆积在文化王国的大门之外。

There are parallels between the mid-1990s assertion by urban planners of Beijing’s primacy as China’s cultural center and early twentieth-century efforts to make it a modern metropolis whose showcasing of Chinese tradition would gain world stature. In “Defining Beiping,” Madeleine Dong details how urban planners sought to develop a self-sustaining economy after the Chinese capital moved from Beijing to Nanjing in 1928. 46. The composition and subject matter of this 1960 photograph bear striking resemblance to European depictions of the academic art ideal, fellow educated professionals joined in study of the nude figure as the representation of enlightenment reason. Johann Zoffany's The Academicians of the Royal Academy (1772), for example, portrays academy members amid plaster casts in the Life Room on the Strand in London. They fix their attention on a nude male model just right of center. As Parker and Pollock point out in Old Mistresses, 87–90, Zoffany's painting also documents gender divisions. The Royal Academy included two female members, both accomplished painters, one a founding member of the academy, who nonetheless were not allowed to study nude models in the Life Room. In order to accurately record the academy's membership, Zoffany included the women in the form of two portraits hanging on the wall behind the model. [返回]

Anagnost, "The Corporeal Politics of Quality (Suzhi)," tracks how Chinese suzhi discourse from the late 1980s on reflected the changing relationship between value and bodies during economic reform. Techniques from institutional campaigns to popular self-help manuals exhorted citizens to raise the quality of the nation by raising their own "quality." Anagnost argues that the practices of distinction that characterized a "person of quality" depended on new forms of consumption and a middle-class desire for upward social mobility. At dusk on August 23, 2001, a migrant worker's voice echoed through the expansive space of a textile factory recently converted into Beijing's East Modern Art Center (Yuanyang yishu zhongxin). The center served as a point of attraction within Ocean Paradise, a real estate development of high-rise apartment buildings still under construction. Lao Wei belted out the opening lines of a folk song from his village in Sichuan Province: "Flowers are covering the branches.... I am the only one alone."[1] As he sang, he wandered through an audience of art world cognoscenti, real estate publicists, and print and television reporters. The crowd had first gathered outside in the humid summer air, as a thunderstorm brewed. After entering the long interior space, they stood expectantly. On cue, dancers perched atop steel support beams began to descend. When the lights were thrown on, their bodies appeared in silhouette against the art center's translucent glass walls. They picked up the refrain of Lao Wei's tune as they dropped to the floor and began their performance against a backdrop of industrial salvage architecture and installation art: clusters of metal barrels, dangling fluorescent tube lighting, a row of manual sewing machines, piles of bricks, and architectural scale models half-buried in sand on the concrete floor. In the weeks that followed, diverse news outlets reported what transpired that evening with headlines like "A Difficult-to-Define Performance" and "Dancing with Another Kind of Body."[2] The art journal Next Wave stated matter-of-factly, "The performance astonished the audience, not only because it took place in this kind of real environment, but also because the performers unexpectedly included thirty rural migrant construction workers."[3] The review in the Guangzhou newspaper Southern Weekly opened with a more evocative description: "Two clusters of people: one whose posture resembled that of prisoners squatted in the distance, some wore no shirts, revealing dark, gleaming skin; another group wore cheap clothing, so that at a glance one could ascertain their identity—migrant worker [mingong]. They started to move, horizontally, pushing close to one another. Then those clothed and bare-chested interwove, two heterogeneous elements mixing freely together."[4] A rare shower of hail fell as audience members later dispersed, punctuating the evening's drama.

2001 年 8 月 23 日黄昏，一名民工的声音在一座不久前改造成北京远洋艺术中心（Yuanyang yishu zhongxin）的纺织厂宽阔空间里回荡。该中心是“远洋天地”内的一个吸引点——这是一个仍在施工中的高层公寓楼盘。老魏放声唱起他四川老家一首民歌的开头：“花儿盖满了枝头……只有我孤身一人。”[1] 他一边唱，一边在由艺术界行家、楼盘宣传人员和报刊电视记者组成的观众中游走。人群起初聚集在潮湿的夏日空气里，雷雨正在酝酿。进入狭长的室内空间后，他们满怀期待地站着。信号一到，栖在钢梁上的舞者开始下降。灯光亮起，他们的身体在艺术中心半透明玻璃墙的映衬下显出剪影。他们接续老魏曲调的叠句，落到地面，在利用旧工业建筑改造而成的空间和装置艺术的背景前开始表演：成簇的金属桶、悬垂的日光灯管、一排脚踏缝纫机、成堆的砖块，以及半埋在混凝土地面沙堆里的建筑模型。随后几周，多家新闻媒体以《一场难以定义的演出》《与另一种身体共舞》之类的标题报道了当晚发生的事。[2] 艺术杂志《新潮》直言：“这场演出令观众震惊，不仅因为它在这样一种真实环境中发生，还因为表演者中竟有三十名农村来的建筑民工。”[3] 《南方周末》的评论以更具感染力的描写开篇：“两群人：一群人的姿态像蹲在远处的囚犯，有些人没穿上衣，露出黝黑发亮的皮肤；另一群人穿着廉价衣服，一眼便可认出身份——民工（mingong）。他们开始移动，横向地、彼此紧挨着推挤。然后，穿衣服的和光膀子的交织在一起，两种异质元素自由混合。”[4] 观众后来散去时，一场罕见的冰雹落下，为当晚的戏剧性添上标点。

Dancing with Mingong marked the opening and eventual demise of the East Modern Art Center, which would be torn down just over two years later.[5] This multimedia happening—produced by a choreographer, Chinese and foreign modern dancers, a documentary filmmaker, a photographer, and two visual artists—presents a conundrum. What do we make of so-called avant-gardes working together with migrant construction workers, aged sixteen to forty-five, and real estate entrepreneurs from the spin-off corporation of a state-owned enterprise, attended by a full press of Beijing's cultural elite and media outlets? How did a factory building in the middle of a commodity apartment development, the only remnant of an enormous socialist work unit that once provided workers with housing, become an art center? The brief efflorescence of the East Modern Art Center represents a turning point in the role of art museums in China.

《与民工共舞》标志着远洋艺术中心的开幕，也预示着它的终结——仅仅两年多后，它便被拆除。[5] 这场多媒体事件由一位编舞、中外现代舞者、一位纪录片导演、一位摄影师和两位视觉艺术家共同制作，呈现出一个难解的问题。所谓先锋与十六岁到四十五岁的建筑民工，以及国有企业衍生公司的房地产企业家共同合作，北京文化精英与媒体几乎倾巢出席，这该如何理解？一座位于商品房楼盘中央的厂房——一个曾为工人提供住房的庞大社会主义单位的唯一遗存——如何变成艺术中心？远洋艺术中心的短暂绽放，标志着中国美术馆角色的一次转折。

The reform-era coalition of government and private interests invested in remaking Beijing created new opportunities for contemporary artists. It altered their relationship to a previously censorious state and broadened domestic viewership of their work. The intersection of urban planning, real estate, and art shaped their lives and sometimes became the subject of their art. Market-reform exhibition spaces gradually surpassed state-controlled museums exhibiting the art of proletarian revolutionary nationalism. Museums, increasingly supported by private funds, simultaneously became a model for real estate projects premised on a "desiring China," Lisa Rofel's characterization of a postsocialist reimagination of social life prioritizing "the individual who operates through sexual, material, and affective self-interest."[6] These projects capitalized on the desire for a worldly cultural milieu, in which the cosmopolitan art museum served as a modernizing, elevating brand.

Art centers created as part of commodity apartment enterprises emerged as a trend during the first years of new millennium Beijing. In ventures such as the East Modern Art Center, Left Bank Gallery, One World Art Center, X-Ray Art Center, and Today Art Gallery, urban planners and real estate developers became collaborators with artists and curators. Many of these experiments were ephemeral. Ten years later, only the Today Art Gallery remained. Their fleeting existence highlights conflicting ideas about the purpose of art exhibition in China's capital as global showcase. Was art meant to express social critique, display national modernity, create class distinction, or maximize the value of newly commodified property? These experiments also reflected large-scale social restructuring throughout the 1980s and 1990s, in which urban housing reform contributed to increasing privatization of real estate and dismantling of socialist public housing and land management.[7] Intensive demolition and relocation schemes turned the city over. Appropriated land was largely used for commercial development, including new commodity apartments (shangpin fang), leading to property speculation and skyrocketing prices. Bulldozers and construction cranes, as well as residents' complaints and protests, pervaded Beijing and set the scene for contemporary art production.

作为商品房开发项目的一部分而创建艺术中心，在新千年最初几年的北京成为潮流。在远洋艺术中心、左岸画廊、一世界艺术中心、X 光艺术中心、今日美术馆等项目中，城市规划者和房地产开发商成为艺术家与策展人的合作者。许多实验都是短暂的。十年后，只有今日美术馆仍在。它们的昙花一现凸显了关于艺术展览目的的相互冲突的观念——在中国首都作为全球展示窗口之际：艺术是要表达社会批判、展示国家现代性、制造阶级区隔，还是最大化刚刚商品化的房产价值？这些实验也反映了整个 1980 年代和 1990 年代的大规模社会重组，其中城市住房改革推动了房地产的日益私有化，并拆解了社会主义的公共住房与土地管理制度。[7] 密集的拆迁安置计划把城市翻了个底朝天。征用的土地大多用于商业开发，包括新的商品房，导致房地产投机和价格飞涨。推土机和建筑起重机，以及居民的抱怨与抗议，遍布北京，为当代艺术生产搭起了舞台。

In the intertwining of public and private characteristic of late socialist China, real estate developers who ventured into art center construction and management represented one unexpected outcome, an externality of the nationwide reform of state-owned enterprises (soes). As soes developed into quasi-private, semi-independent entities, their leaders took land from downsized or shuttered factories and entered the expanding commercial property market. Members of the emergent real estate profession explored various marketing strategies; those who incorporated art galleries into their plans saw the promotion of contemporary art as a marker of taste that could attract potential homebuyers. An ironic situation arose for contemporary art. Critics and curators from the West understood Chinese officials to be repressive and disapproving of local contemporary art; they often found this belief confirmed by Chinese artists who complained about the dearth of domestic exhibition space for avant-garde expression. At the same time, new exhibition spaces for contemporary art, some created by branches of China's largest and most influential soes, began opening. For example, within the same year that "Canceled": Exhibiting Experimental Art in China was shown at the Smart Museum of Art in Chicago, one of its featured artists, Song Dong, participated in the large-scale experimental art project Dancing with Mingong at the East Modern Art Center, developed in Beijing by the state-owned China Ocean Shipping Company (cosco).[8]

在晚期社会主义中国特有的公与私的交织中，冒险进入艺术中心建设与管理的房地产开发商，代表了一个出人意料的结果——国有企业（SOEs）全国性改革的外部性。随着国企发展为准私人、半独立的实体，其领导层从裁员或倒闭的工厂取得土地，进入不断扩张的商业地产市场。新兴房

地产业的人士探索各种营销策略；将艺术画廊纳入计划者，把推广当代艺术视为品位标志，以吸引潜在购房者。当代艺术由此陷入一种讽刺处境。西方批评家和策展人认为中国官员压制、不赞成本土当代艺术；他们常常发现，抱怨国内缺乏先锋表达展览空间的中国艺术家印证了这一看法。与此同时，一些当代艺术的新展览空间开始开放，其中有的正由全中国最大、最具影响力的国企的分支机构创建。例如，在《“ 取消 ”：中国实验艺术展》于芝加哥斯马特艺术博物馆展出的同一年，其参展艺术家之一宋东参加了大型实验艺术项目《与民工共舞》——演出场地是国有的中国远洋运输公司（COSCO）在北京开发的远洋艺术中心。[8]

Part of artists' distinction as interlocutors of cosmopolitan culture included engagement with globally circulating forms such as site-specific art, with its goal of exploring physical and social space outside museum walls. This marked a significant shift from the 1990s, during which official hostility to avant-garde art, particularly the unpredictable mediums of installation and performance art, prevailed. During that period, some artists turned to site-specific art in reaction to the conservatism of official exhibit spaces, and more importantly as a way of responding to the massive changes wrought by urban renewal.[9] They moved out of the studio to engage their social environment in new ways. They roved the streets with spray paint can, camera, or camcorder in hand. They created installation and performance pieces in apartments, courtyards, and alleyways as well as in public spaces—parks, factories, and historical locations like the Great Wall. Documentary photographs and videos of performance pieces sometimes ended up in museums, but gallery exhibition was not necessarily originally intended. This situation changed as display in new quasi-public, quasi-private art spaces presented artists with opportunities for increased exposure to local audiences, as well as international art world observers. The practice of site-specific art then ran the risk of becoming tamed and commercialized as artists created pieces in and specifically for these new spaces.

艺术家作为世界性文化对话者的独特地位，部分来自他们对全球流通的艺术形式的参与，例如以探索博物馆围墙之外的物理与社会空间为目标的场域特定艺术。这标志着与 1990 年代的重大转变——当时官方对先锋艺术，尤其是装置和行为艺术这类不可预测的媒介，普遍持敌对态度。在此期间，一些艺术家转向场域特定艺术，以回应官方展览空间的保守主义，更重要的是以此回应城市更新带来的巨变。[9] 他们走出画室，以新的方式介入社会环境。他们手持喷漆罐、相机或摄像机在街头游走。他们在公寓、庭院、胡同以及公园、工厂和长城等历史场所创作装置和行为作品。行为作品的纪实照片和录像有时最终出现在博物馆里，但画廊展览未必是最初意图。随着新的准公共、准私人艺术空间中的展示为艺术家提供更多接触本地观众以及国际艺术界观察者的机会，这种情况发生了变化。场域特定艺术的实践于是面临被驯化和商业化的风险，因为艺术家开始在这些新空间中、并专门为这些空间创作作品。

The story of the East Modern Art Center demonstrates how artists got caught up in the nexus of urban planning, real estate, and art. After the center opened in August 2001, it quickly became a hotspot for contemporary art exhibition, although a short-lived one. Its rise and fall reflects tensions over the role of art: to highlight growing forms of inequality and alienation in showcase Beijing; or to smooth them over in the promotion of commodity value, cultural capital, and middle-class sensibility as a form of global achievement.[10]

远洋艺术中心的故事展示了艺术家如何卷入城市规划、房地产与艺术的交织网络。该中心于 2001 年 8 月开放后，迅速成为当代艺术展览的热点，尽管短暂。它的兴衰反映了围绕艺术角色的紧张：是凸显展示北京日益增长的不平等与异化形式，还是在推广商品价值、文化资本和中产阶级感性作为全球成就形式的过程中将其抹平。[10]

To provide the larger context for this case study, this chapter first presents an analysis of the nested relationship of state-led urban renewal, privatized real estate, art exhibition spaces, and art. Zooming in from the level of the city to Ocean Paradise to the East Modern Art Center to individual artworks exhibited there illuminates the various interests involved in the redefinition of what a museum is meant to do. Thinking about the linkages between these different scales sets up questions about how they influence one another in top-down or bottom-up ways. I begin, on the macro level, with how Beijing itself became a showcase in the city's Olympic bid to go global, with spectacular urban planning initiatives meant to symbolize China's cosmopolitan modernity and widespread demolition of historical neighborhoods leading to pseudo-preservation and museumification. I turn next to the reform-era phenomenon in China of commodity housing as part of a "growth-machine" ethic and an overall increase in consumption, and examine developers' leveraging of art as a civilizing commodity. These sections culminate in an exploration of the historical layers, classed and gendered social relations, and ways of thinking that came together in the East Modern Art Center.

为给这一案例研究提供更大背景，本章首先分析国家主导的城市更新、私有化房地产、艺术展览空间与艺术之间的嵌套关系。从城市层面推进到远洋天地，再到远洋艺术中心，再聚焦到在那里展出的单件作品，可以揭示重新界定博物馆应有功能所涉及的各种利益。思考这些不同尺度之间的联系，会引出关于它们如何以自上而下或自下而上的方式相互影响的问题。我先从宏观层面开始，考察北京本身如何在申奥走向全球的过程中成为展示窗口，包括旨在象征中国世界性现代性的壮观城市规划举措，以及历史街区的大规模拆除如何导致伪保存和博物馆化。接下来，我转向改革时期中国商品房现象，把它作为“增长机器”伦理与整体消费增长的一部分，并考察开发商如何把艺术用作文明化的商品。这些部分最终汇聚到对远洋艺术中心的历史层次、阶级化与性别化的社会关系，以及在此交汇的各种思维方式进行探讨。

After Beijing won the 2008 Olympic bid on July 13, 2001, a second wave of urban renewal, even more intense than that of the 1990s, engulfed the city.[11] In addition to large-scale demolition and relocation, the government hired star international architects to design key monuments: Paul Andreu's National Grand Theater, Rem Koolhaas's China Central Television headquarters, and Herzog and de Meuron's Beijing National Stadium.[12] Capital development led to a new place of prominence for the architectural scale model, as officials and residents alike debated monumental designs and future projections of the city's layout. These three-dimensional visualizations became part of everyday life, displayed as works of art and commodities in new museums and real estate offices, and in advertisements that filled newspapers and appeared plastered on walls and billboards throughout the city.[13]

2001 年 7 月 13 日北京赢得 2008 年奥运会主办权后，第二波城市更新吞没了这座城市，比 1990 年代更为猛烈。[11] 除了大规模拆迁，政府还聘请国际明星建筑师设计标志性建筑：保罗·安德鲁的国家大剧院、雷姆·库哈斯的中央电视台总部大楼、赫尔佐格和德梅隆的北京国家体育场。[12] 首都建设使建筑模型获得新的突出地位，官员和居民都在辩论纪念性设计和城市布局的未来想象。这些三维可视化成为日常生活的一部分，作为艺术品和商品陈列在新的博物馆和售楼处，也出现在充斥报纸、张贴于全城墙面和广告牌的广告中。[13]

This obsession with planning and the symbolic importance of the capital's built environment can be traced to the premodern era. The legacy of imperial city planning persists in the conflict between spatial expressions of power and functionality.[14] The Beijing Urban Planning Museum, which opened in 2004 on the southeast corner of Tiananmen Square, celebrates planning as a legitimizing act, underwritten in part by new real estate development companies, including Sino-Ocean (cosco's subsidiary) and soho China. Its spectacular projections of the city's future elided social hierarchies intensified by urban renewal: the displacement of long-term residents from the city center to less desirable, peripheral locations and the temporary labor force of rural migrants brought in to build the city's new buildings. The architectural model on display became a fetish object on which audiences were mobilized to project collective dreamworlds—of the private, aestheticized space of the commodity apartment and of China's global arrival. In Susan Buck-Morss's formulation, such dreamworlds of modernity "are expressions of a utopian desire for social arrangements that transcend existing forms," but that become dangerous "when their enormous energy is used instrumentally by structures of power, mobilized as an instrument of force that turns against the very masses who were supposed to benefit."[15]

对规划的痴迷以及首都建成环境的象征重要性，可追溯到前现代时期。帝国城市规划的遗产延续在空间权力表达与功能之间的冲突中。[14] 2004 年在天安门广场东南角开放的北京市规划展览馆，把规划颂扬为一种赋予合法性的行为，其部分资金来自新的房地产开发公司，包括远洋（中远的子公司）和 SOHO 中国。它壮观的城市未来投影抹去了因城市更新而加剧的社会等级：长期居民从市中心被迁往条件较差的外围地区，以及为建造城市新楼而引入的农村流动劳动力。展出的建筑模型成为拜物教对象，观众被动员在其上投射集体梦想世界——商品公寓私密的、审美化的空间，以及中国的全球登场。用苏珊·巴克-莫斯的话说，这类现代性梦想世界 " 表达了对超越现有

形式的社会安排的乌托邦欲望”，但当“其巨大能量被权力结构工具性地利用，被动员为一种暴力工具，转而针对本应受益的群众”时，便变得危险。[15]

In 2007, the four stories of the exposed steel beam and glass-encased Beijing Urban Planning Museum presented an orchestrated chronology of the city from its founding in the Yuan Dynasty to its Olympic triumph. From a ground-floor reception area, visitors proceeded to second-floor exhibits of Beijing's eighteen districts and counties and a third-floor narrative of the capital's development through the Yuan, Ming, Qing, and Republican periods, with socialist planning by and large skipped over. History then gave way to the museum's largest and most popular exhibit: a scale map of the contemporary city that spread across the floor under dramatic lighting. Three-dimensional architectural models represented the urban core surrounding the Forbidden City. This area was cordoned off, but the map continued well beyond with aerial photographs, under glass and illuminated from below, which visitors walked over as they searched for familiar locations (figure 2.01). Side exhibits displayed areas of architectural distinction, such Beijing's new high-rise-filled Central Business District (cbd). The fourth floor included models of Beijing's Olympic sports facilities, illuminated maps of global cities such as Paris, Tokyo, London, Moscow, and New York, and a multimedia hall where visitors could watch a double feature of The Immortal City and The New Beijing. The second

3-D animation offered a visual ride through a vertiginous cityscape that mixed together existing buildings with future designs, such as the Rem Koolhaas cctv tower.[16]

2007 年，北京市规划展览馆的四层空间以裸露钢梁和玻璃幕墙构成，呈现了一部精心编排的城市编年史，从元代建城到奥运胜利。从底层接待区开始，参观者前往二层观看北京十八个区县的展览，再到三层观看元、明、清和民国时期首都发展的叙述，社会主义规划大体被跳过。历史随后让位于博物馆最大、最受欢迎的展品：一张在戏剧性灯光下铺满地面的当代城市比例地图。三维建筑模型代表紫禁城周边的城市核心区。该区域被围栏隔开，但地图远远延伸出去，以航空照片的形式置于玻璃之下、从下方照亮，参观者一边走在其上，一边寻找熟悉的地点（图 2.01）。侧展厅展示具有建筑特色的区域，如北京布满新高楼的中央商务区（CBD）。四层包括北京奥运体育设施的模型、巴黎、东京、伦敦、莫斯科、纽约等世界城市被照亮的地图，以及一个多媒体厅，观众可以在那里观看《不朽之城》和《新北京》双片连映。第二部三维动画提供了一次穿越令人眩晕的城市景观的视觉之旅，将现有建筑与未来设计混合在一起，例如雷姆 • 库哈斯的央视大楼。[16]

If the museum encouraged visitors to understand Beijing as a world metropolis that represented the past and future grandeur of China, with its socialist history strategically erased, it also linked this vision to a progrowth, commercialized mode of urban dwelling. Nestled next to the third-floor historical exhibits, a model commodity apartment half-hidden behind white plastic walls beckoned visitors to enter a space of modern domestic fantasy, in which they could aspire to become part of, to inhabit on a personal level, the museum showcase of Beijing. Oversize, ornate, vaguely Victorian chairs dominated the living room. A mannequin of a young girl lay on a velvet-draped bed in a darkened room on whose walls a dreamy, flowery projection flickered. Mod red café stools in a living room looked out on a picture window/screen that showed a video-loop view of the Olympic Green with fireworks exploding over it to a syncopated soundtrack. Discrete white raised characters on the outside wall of the exhibit informed visitors that it was “donated by soho China.”

如果博物馆鼓励参观者把北京理解为一个代表中国过去与未来辉煌的世界大都市，并策略性地抹去其社会主义历史，它也将这一愿景与一种亲增长、商业化的城市居住方式联系起来。在三层历史展览旁边，一套半掩在白色塑料墙后的样板商品房邀请参观者进入一个现代家庭幻想空间，在那里他们可以渴望成为北京博物馆展示的一部分，在个人层面上栖居其中。客厅里摆着超大、华丽、隐约带有维多利亚风格的椅子。一个年轻女孩的人体模型躺在铺着天鹅绒的床上，房间昏暗，墙上闪烁着梦幻的花卉投影。客厅里的现代红色咖啡凳朝向一扇画窗/屏幕，屏幕上循环播放奥林匹克公园的影像，烟花在切分音配乐中绽放。展品外墙上的独立白色凸起字告诉参观者，它“由 SOHO 中国捐赠”。

A corollary of the move to turn the city into a site of display was the growth of museums. The widespread demolition caused by urban planning spurred efforts to preserve the cultural heritage of quickly disappearing historic neighborhoods. Museumlike spaces displayed protected fragments or theme-park-like re-creations, ranging from the Red Gate Gallery's exhibiting of contemporary art in the Dongbianmen watchtower of the old city wall to rickshaw alleyway tours of the Houhai neighborhood to the shopping mall re-creation of the Qing Dynasty Qianmen commercial district. The development of museums became an important sector of China's growing culture industry. From 2001 to 2010, the number of registered museums in Beijing grew from 110 to 156, a 42 percent increase.[17] These numbers include private museums, the first of which was registered in Beijing in 1996, and large state projects such as the China Millennium Monument (2000), Beijing Urban Planning Museum (2004), China National Film Museum (2005), and the new Capital Museum (2006). In Beijing, the temporal and ideological relationship between urban renewal and museum development conferred on museums a double mandate of memorializing certain pasts and imagining certain futures, thereby muting debate over the catastrophic effects of the Communist dreamworld or of the market-reform dreamworld rapidly replacing it.

把城市变成展示场所的另一个结果是博物馆的增长。城市规划导致的大规模拆除，促使人们努力保护迅速消失的历史街区的文化遗产。类似博物馆的空间展示受保护的碎片，或像主题公园一样的再造景观，从红门画廊在老城墙东便门城楼展示当代艺术，到后海街区的人力车胡同游，再到购物中心对清代前门商业区的再造。博物馆的发展成为中国不断增长的文化产业的重要部门。从 2001 年到 2010 年，北京注册博物馆的数量从 110 座增长到 156 座，增幅 42%。[17] 这些数字包括私人博物馆（北京首家私人博物馆于 1996 年注册），以及大型国家项目，如中华世纪坛（2000）、北京市规划展览馆（2004）、中国电影博物馆（2005）和新首都博物馆（2006）。在北京，城市更新与博物馆发展之间的时间与意识形态关系，赋予博物馆双重使命：纪念某些过去，想象某些未来，从而压制关于共产主义梦想世界或迅速取代它的市场改革梦想世界之灾难性后果的辩论。

Museum display practices create frames for understanding and interacting with the world that extend beyond institutional walls. Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett describes this "museum effect": "Not only do ordinary things become special when placed in museum settings, but also the museum experience itself becomes a model for experiencing life outside its walls.... An ethnographic bell jar drops over the terrain. A neighborhood, village, or region becomes for all intents and purposes a living museum in situ."[18] The "museum effect" was at work in contemporary Beijing, to the extent that visiting foreigners or Chinese whose own lives were sufficiently buffered from the material and social ruptures of urban renewal could explore the city as a museum of a disappearing past. A form of what Marilyn Ivy calls "discourses of the vanishing," leisured consumption of a suspended past held on the verge of disappearing assuaged anxieties about the loss of cultural identity while also demonstrating the achievement of global modernity.[19] In Beijing, the museum effect also encouraged residents who aspired to cosmopolitan parity with global cities like New York and Paris to see new commodity homes as modern art objects, a future under construction in which China is recognized as a place in the process of accumulating widely acknowledged forms of privilege and beauty. The museum could be as much a dreamy snow globe as an ethnographic bell jar.

博物馆展示实践创造了理解和与世界互动的方式，其框架延伸至机构围墙之外。芭芭拉·柯申布拉特-金布莱特将这种“博物馆效应”描述为：“不仅普通物品被置于博物馆环境中时变得特殊，博物馆经验本身也成为在围墙之外体验生活的模式……一个民族志玻璃钟罩罩在地形上。一个街区、

村庄或地区实际上就成了一座原地保存的活态博物馆。”[18] “博物馆效应”在当代北京发挥了作用，以至于来访的外国人，或自身生活与城市更新的物质和社会断裂有足够缓冲的中国人，都可以把这座城市当作一座展示正在消失的过去的博物馆来探索。这是玛丽琳·艾维所称“消逝的话语”的一种形式：对悬置在消失边缘的过去的悠闲消费，缓解了文化认同丧失的焦虑，同时也展示了全球现代性的成就。[19] 在北京，博物馆效应还鼓励那些渴望与纽约、巴黎等全球城市平起平坐的居民，把新的商品房视为现代艺术品，视其为正在建设中的未来——中国在其中被认可为一个正在积累广泛承认的特权与美的形式的地方。博物馆可以既是梦幻的雪花玻璃球，也是民族志的玻璃钟罩。

State urban planning initiatives coincided with a new housing regime. City residents once received affordable housing through the socialist work unit, but beginning in the 1990s this basic resource became commoditized, with new apartments built and sold by progrowth coalitions of private and public entities.[20] Scholars of Chinese urban planning have taken up the “growth machine” as a comparative heuristic for thinking about China’s rapid urbanization during economic reform. This concept theorizes the value transactions that drive urban redevelopment: the everyday use value of a particular site—community cohesion, everyday sociality, local history, small-scale commerce—is usurped by a quest for exchange value in which land is commoditized for wealth accumulation. In the city as growth machine, “the pursuit of exchange values so permeates the life of localities that cities become organized as enterprises devoted to the increase of aggregate rent levels through the intensification of land use.”[21] This process, while often protested by residents in the neighborhoods it threatens to obliterate, “pervades virtually all aspects of local life, including the political system, the agenda for economic development, and even cultural organizations like baseball teams and museums.”[22]

国家城市规划举措与新的住房制度同时发生。城市居民曾经通过社会主义工作单位获得负担得起的住房，但从 1990 年代开始，这一基本资源被商品化，新公寓由亲增长的公私实体联盟建造和出售。[20] 中国城市规划学者把“增长机器”作为比较性启发工具，用来思考经济改革期间中国快速城市化。这一概念从理论上阐释了驱动城市再开发的价值交易：特定地点的日常使用价值——社区凝聚、日常社会性、地方历史、小规模商业——被对交换价值的追求所取代，土地被商品化以积累财富。在以增长机器为组织方式的城市中，“对交换价值的追求如此渗透地方生活，以至于城市被组织成企业，通过土地使用的集约化来增加总地租水平”。[21] 这一过程虽然常遭面临被抹除的社区居民抗议，却“几乎渗透地方生活的所有方面，包括政治制度、经济发展议程，甚至棒球队和博物馆之类的文化组织”。[22]

In an article titled “Is History Repeating Itself?” Yan Zhang and Ke Fang compare the U.S. federal urban redevelopment program of the 1950s and 1960s with contemporary Chinese efforts and conclude that a city like Beijing is a “growth machine in the making.”[23] They point out many similarities between the two cases, including destruction of tradition and tricks employed by elite coalitions of government and business interests that turn the stated beneficiaries of development into victims. They also identify ways in which the Chinese case reflects a different political and socioeconomic context. Under market reform, increased decentralization of government conferred to local government much of the power to control the exchange value of once publically held land; and their business dealings included involvement with both domestic and foreign partners. The unclear line between public and private in entities like local soes and their spin-off companies facilitated the tight networking of government and business elites in redevelopment schemes; these networks, with the power to enact ideological visions of spatial modernity and to accumulate disproportionate wealth for those at the top, constitute late-socialist progrowth coalitions.[24] Finally, in contrast with sporadic success in the United States of grassroots activism to protect neighborhoods from being bulldozed, tight social control in China meant that in spite of isolated, often well-publicized protests, popular resistance did little to change the course of urban renewal.

在《历史是否在重演?》一文中，Yan Zhang 和 Ke Fang 将 1950 至 1960 年代美国联邦城市再开发计划与当代中国实践相比较，得出结论：像北京这样的城市是“形成中的增长机器”。[23] 他们指出两个案例之间有许多相似之处，包括对传统的破坏，以及政府与商业利益精英联盟所采用的伎俩——把宣称的开发受益者变成受害者。他们还指出中国案例反映不同政治与社会经济背景的方式。在市场改革下，政府权力日益下放，使地方政府获得控制曾经公有土地交换价值的大部分权力；其商业往来包括与国内外合作伙伴的接触。在地方国企及其衍生公司等实体中，公私界限模糊，促进了政府与商业精英在再开发计划中的紧密网络；这些网络拥有实施空间现代性的意识形态愿景、并为上层积累不成比例财富的权力，构成晚期社会主义的亲增长联盟。[24] 最后，与美国草根行动在保护社区免遭推土机方面偶尔取得成功不同，中国严密的社会控制意味着，尽管有孤立的、往往被广泛报道的抗议，民众抵抗对城市更新的进程几乎无所改变。

Beijing as a growth machine in the making opens up questions about the tenuous interpellation of artists by progrowth coalitions. On the one hand, with state stipends for artists a thing of the socialist past, they sought new ways to survive in an increasingly market-driven environment: through sales of artwork, patronage by wealthy individuals, participation in primarily overseas artist residencies, design work, teaching, or other jobs that supported their ability to make art. On the other hand, not all artists fully embraced the commoditization of their work. In fact, doing so could conflict with their own philosophies of art as a form of social observation and critique. The counterpractices developed by artists like those who created Dancing with Mingong at the East Modern Art Center destabilized visions of growth-machine cities as inevitable or desirable.[25] At the same time, the difficulty they experienced in integrating public involvement in their site-specific experiments drew attention to the social context of weak community power detailed by urban planning scholars.

把北京视为形成中的增长机器，引出关于亲增长联盟与艺术家之间不稳固的询唤关系的问题。一方面，在艺术家国家津贴已成为社会主义过去之后，他们在日益由市场驱动的环境中寻求新的生存方式：出售作品、富裕个人赞助、参加主要在海外的艺术家驻留项目、设计工作、教学或其他支持其创作的工作。另一方面，并非所有艺术家都完全接受其作品的商品化。事实上，这样做可能与

他们自己的艺术哲学相冲突，即艺术是一种社会观察和批判的形式。像在远洋艺术中心创作《与民工共舞》的艺术家们所发展出的反实践，动摇了把增长机器城市视为不可避免或可取的愿景。[25] 同时，他们在把公众参与融入场域特定实验时经历的困难，也引起人们对城市规划学者所详述的社区权力薄弱这一社会背景的关注。

A genealogy of the term apartment art demonstrates the turn in Chinese contemporary art from a subversive underground activity to a form of cultural capital with new domestic market value. Gao Minglu coined this term while writing about Chinese avant-garde art in the 1990s:

“公寓艺术”一词的谱系，展示了中国当代艺术从颠覆性的地下活动向在国内市场上获得新价值的文化资本的转变。高名潞在 1990 年代论述中国先锋艺术时创造了这个词：

> Facing many difficulties during the nineties—such as a lack of acceptance of the avant-garde by both official and commercial galleries in China, being ignored by the media, lack of attention by the organizers of some Chinese avant-garde exhibitions overseas, and a paucity of financial resources—conceptual artists have had to retreat to confined spaces. They have been forced to do or keep their work at home; to employ inexpensive materials in small-scale work that can be displayed in a private space; and to communicate only with a small audience of artists and interested persons. Thus I call this phenomenon Apartment Art (Gongyu yishu).[26]

> 在九十年代面临重重困难——先锋艺术在中国既不被官方画廊也不被商业画廊接受，被媒体忽视，一些中国先锋艺术海外展览的组织者不予关注，且资金匮乏——观念艺术家不得不退回到狭小的空间。他们被迫在家中创作或保存作品；使用廉价材料制作可在私人空间展示的小型作品；只能与由艺术家和感兴趣者组成的小圈子交流。因此我把这一现象称为公寓艺术（Gongyu yishu）。[26]

Just a few years later, this definition would come to seem outdated as some of the very artists Gao named as exemplary of the category began to exhibit their work in a widening ambit of domestic and international contexts. By the early 2000s, the term could be repurposed to describe a new traffic between art and commodity apartment that pulled artists into its sphere of influence.

仅仅几年后，高名潞列为该范畴范例的一些艺术家开始在国内和国际不断扩展的范围内展出作品，这一定义便显得过时了。到 2000 年代初，这个词可以被重新用来描述艺术与商品房之间新的流通，这种流通把艺术家拉入其影响范围。

As an emerging urban middle class in China embraced the privatization of property and lifestyle, they sought ways to establish their class distinction, against the historical backdrop of a once putatively classless society.[27] As real estate developers advertised their new private housing projects, they circulated images marketing different types of middle-class distinction. One popular strategy in Beijing was an association with art, not for social revolution but for art’s sake. These images promoted art as a desired form of cosmopolitan leisure. They asserted the following proposition: one starts with an empty apartment and learns to design and decorate this private space as an expression of personal aesthetics that can be developed through the proper art of consumption.

随着中国新兴城市中产阶级拥抱财产和生活方式的私有化，他们寻求确立自身阶级区隔的方式，而背景是一个曾经被宣称无阶级的社会。[27] 当房地产开发商宣传新的私宅项目时，他们传播推销不同类型中产阶级区隔的图像。在北京，一种流行的策略是与艺术建立联系——不是为了社会革命，而是为艺术而艺术。这些图像把艺术推崇为一种令人向往的世界性休闲方式。它们提出如下主张：从一间空公寓开始，学习设计和装饰这个私人空间，作为个人审美的表达，而这种审美可以通过掌握恰当的消费之道来培养。

A campaign for the Beautiful Garden housing estate incorporated imagery drawn from Western masterpieces, works that would have been declared bourgeois and decadent during the height of Chinese socialism. Half-page newspaper ads featured a rendering of the apartment complex in various European styles of modernist painting. Paul Gaugin's 1894 Nave Nave Moe (Sacred Spring) inspires their nod to postimpressionist symbolism. In an ingenious reworking of the original (figure 2.02), the foreground features an almost exact copy of two Tahitian women seated on the ground, while the middle ground turns two bathers into apartment residents clad in white, and the background replaces totemic stone sculptures with an apartment block. The accompanying slogan, "Return to Beautiful Garden," plays on the double meaning of coming home to one's private oasis and achieving a position of worldly privilege in which one can recognize this art historical reference and appreciate Gaugin's primitivizing, feminizing exoticism as an expression of one's own progress. Beautiful Garden residents, the ad promises, wander through a lush, color-drenched landscape (a figment of the imagination in the polluted megacity of Beijing) like tourists from the developed world while going to and from a modern luxury apartment on the horizon.

"美丽园"住宅小区的广告运动融入了取自西方名作的图像——这些作品在中国社会主义鼎盛时期会被宣判为资产阶级和颓废的。半版报纸广告以不同欧洲现代主义绘画风格呈现该公寓楼群的渲染图。保罗·高更 1894 年的《纳韦·纳韦·莫埃（神圣的春天）》启发了他们对后印象派象征主义的致意。在对原作的巧妙改造中（图 2.02），前景几乎原样复制了两名坐在地上的塔希提妇女，中景把两个沐浴者变成身穿白衣的公寓居民，背景则用一栋公寓楼取代图腾石雕。伴随的广告语"重返美丽园"玩的是双重含义：回到自己的私人绿洲，以及达到一种世界性特权位置——在那里，人们能够辨认这一艺术史典故，并把高更那种原始化、女性化的异国情调欣赏为自身进步的体现。广告承诺，美丽园居民将像来自发达世界的游客一样，漫步于郁郁葱葱、色彩浓郁（在这座污染严重的北京巨型城市中纯属想象）的风景中，同时往返于地平线上一套现代豪华公寓。

The traffic between art and commodity apartment exerted a pull on artists as they forged paths for themselves in an emerging market economy, but it also became a problem for them to explore through the medium of art. I examine the encounters that ensued when artists discovered in Ocean Paradise's East Modern Art Center an intriguing opportunity for creating and exhibiting work. My mode of investigation is archaeological to the extent that I describe the substrata—ways of thinking, forms of sociopolitical organization, and elements of the built environment—that made up this particular Beijing location. These substrata structured what could be expressed artistically. They did not, however, exist in discrete layers that could be easily isolated. Instead they impinged on one another. What appears as a radical shift—the socialist factory razed to make way for the commodity apartments of globalization—also harbored shared qualities of vision. The art created and exhibited in this nested context of Showcase Beijing–Ocean Paradise–East Modern Art Center mixes and plays on the mass utopian grandiosity of socialism and capitalism, participating in but also calling into question the bankruptcy of the dreams they trade on.

艺术与商品房之间的流通在艺术家于新兴市场经济中为自己开辟道路时对他们产生拉力，但也成为他们通过艺术媒介加以探讨的问题。我考察当艺术家在远洋天地的远洋艺术中心发现创作和展出作品的有趣机会时，随之而来的相遇。我的考察方式可以说是考古式的：描述构成这一特定北京地点的基底——思维方式、社会政治组织形式，以及建成环境的要素。这些基底结构了艺术上可以表达的东西。然而，它们并非存在于可轻易分离的离散层次中，而是相互冲撞。看似激进转变的东西——社会主义工厂被夷平，为全球化的商品房让路——也蕴含相通的愿景特质。在这个展示北京—远洋天地—远洋艺术中心的嵌套语境中创作和展出的艺术，混合并戏耍社会主义与资本主义的群众乌托邦宏大幻想，参与其中，也质疑其所交易的梦想的破产。

At the turn of the twenty-first century, Ocean Paradise developers broke ground just outside Ciyun Temple Bridge on Beijing's East Fourth Ring Road. Although the location would soon adjoin the cbd, at the time it remained on the city's edge. The border zone between rural and urban represents a long twentieth-century Chinese history of social debate, in which the city and the country have served as politically demarcated spaces, temporalities, and ideologies. This debate played out in the layers of change made to the site as it was cleared, constructed, razed, gutted, and eventually remade as Ocean Paradise.

二十一世纪之交，远洋天地的开发商在慈云寺桥外、北京东四环路破土动工。虽然该地点很快将与中央商务区毗邻，当时仍在城市边缘。城乡交界地带代表着二十世纪中国漫长社会辩论的历史，城市与乡村在其中充当政治上划定的空间、时间和意识形态。这场辩论体现在该地点历经的层层变化中：清理、建设、夷平、拆空，最终改建为远洋天地。

In 1919, Li Dazhao, the intellectual who two years later cofounded the Chinese Communist Party, denounced the corrupting influence of China's semicolonial cities: "My young friends drifting about in the cities! You should know that the cities are full of crime, and that great contentment is to be found in the villages; that life in the city is more or less the life of a ghost, but that the work going on in the villages is the work of people; that the air in the city is foul and the air in the villages is pure."[28] Thirty years later, Mao Zedong, Great Helmsman of the new state, announced a vision that would stand in tension with Communist commitment to the peasantry for decades to come. He stood atop the Gate of Heavenly Peace and expressed his hope that one day this vantage point would afford a view of hundreds of smokestacks symbolizing China's industrial modernization.[29] On a 1950 street map of Beijing, the area outside of the Second Ring Road remained virtually blank. That would soon change. The rhetorical revolutionary potential of the peasantry laid the ground for the rise of the state industrial sector, with those officially classified as rural citizens provided less access to public goods, such as education and health care, than the urban proletariat. Central planners collectivized land ownership and enacted the hukou (household registration) system that bound farmers to agricultural areas. They simultaneously incorporated key tracts of farmland, once empty spaces on the margins of the city map, into their vision of a factory-studded urban landscape.

1919 年，两年后参与创建中国共产党的知识分子李大钊谴责中国半殖民地城市的腐蚀性影响："我的青年朋友们在城市里漂泊！你们应当知道，城市充满了罪恶，最大的满足在乡村；城市生活或多或少是鬼的生活，而乡村进行的工作是人的工作；城市的空气污浊，乡村的空气纯净。"[28] 三十年后，新国家的伟大舵手毛泽东宣布了一个愿景，它在此后数十年里将与共产党对农民的承诺形成紧张关系。他站在天安门城楼上，表达了他的希望：有朝一日，从这个制高点望去，能看到数以百计象征中国工业现代化的烟囱。[29] 在 1950 年的一张北京街道地图上，二环路以外的地区几乎是空白。这种情况很快将改变。农民在修辞上的革命潜力为国家工业部门的兴起奠定基础，而官方划为农村公民的人获得教育和医疗等公共物品的机会少于城市无产阶级。中央计划者将土地所有制集体化，并实施把农民束缚在农业地区的户口制度。他们同时把主要农田——曾经是城市地图边缘的空白空间——纳入工厂林立城市景观的愿景中。

To the southeast of Ciyun Temple, work teams cleared agricultural fields and traced the ground with the lines of a modernist grid. Foundations were poured for spinning and weaving workshops and worker dormitories of what would become China's three largest state-run textile factories, the No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3 Cotton Mills. At the height of production, each factory employed approximately eight thousand workers, more than 80 percent of whom were female. In "Talking of Women's Liberation," a correspondent for Peking Review, an official foreign-language weekly, recounts a 1973 visit to the No. 3 Cotton Mill. Deputy Secretary Wang, a veteran cadre and member of her work unit's party standing committee, proudly stated that in 1955 she had helped build the factory.[30] Some three decades later, China Textile News reported the financial challenges faced by the Beijing Cotton Textile Group, the conglomerate name assigned to the three mills after their incorporation in the 1990s.[31]

在慈云寺东南方，工作队清理农田，并以现代主义网格的线条在地面上划出轮廓。他们为将成为中国三大国营纺织厂——国棉一厂、二厂、三厂——的纺纱织布车间和工人宿舍浇筑地基。在生产高峰期，每家工厂雇佣约八千名工人，其中 80% 以上是女性。官方外文周刊《北京周报》的一位记者在《谈妇女解放》中记述了 1973 年访问国棉三厂的经历。王副书记是一位老干部，也是她所在工作单位的党委常委，她自豪地说，1955 年她曾参与建造这座工厂。[30] 大约三十年后，《中国纺织报》报道了北京棉纺织集团面临的财务挑战——该集团是三家工厂在 1990 年代合并后所冠的企业名称。[31]

When Deng Xiaoping advocated for opening and reform to chuang shijie (break a path to the world), the related phrase xia hai (jump into the ocean) emerged as a 1990s buzzword. Figuratively meaning to abandon socialist work affiliations and go into private business, it became the organizing logic of the Ocean Paradise brand. The land under the No. 3 Cotton Mill was sold to the state-owned cosco, whose containers fill cargo ships in ports worldwide and whose leaders had diversified into real estate. cosco's commercial real estate ventures, which began in the port cities of Shanghai, Dalian, Qingdao, Guangzhou, and Nantong, expanded and joined forces with Sinochem, one of China's four major state-owned oil companies. This merger gave rise to cosred (cosco Real Estate Development), eventually known as Sino-Ocean Land Limited, and in 2000 they received permission to begin construction in the capital. A policy enacted after Beijing won its Olympic bid in 2001 mandated that all industrial enterprises move outside of the Fifth Ring Road, in part to control air pollution. The No. 3 Cotton Mill workers were laid off or transferred to other units, and bulldozers quickly reduced rows of workshops and dormitories to rubble.

当邓小平倡导改革开放、闯世界（chuang shijie）时，相关说法“下海”（xia hai）作为 1990 年代流行语出现。它比喻放弃社会主义工作归属、进入私营商业，成为远洋天地品牌的运作逻辑。国棉三厂所在的土地被出售给国有的中远公司（COSCO）——其集装箱装满世界各港口的货轮，其领导层已多元化进入房地产。中远的商业房地产业务始于上海、大连、青岛、广州和南通等港口城市，随后扩张并联合中国四大国有石油公司之一的中化。这一合并催生了中远房地产开发公司（COSRED），最终称为远洋地产有限公司；2000 年，他们获准在首都开始建设。北京 2001 年申奥成功后颁布的一项政策规定，所有工业企业迁至五环路以外，部分原因是为了控制空气污染。国棉三厂的工人被下岗或调往其他单位，推土机很快把一排排车间和宿舍化为瓦砾。

The Ocean Paradise developers hired hok (Hellmuth, Obata + Kassabaum), a transnational architecture firm based in St. Louis, to design the new commodity apartment complex. One of the project architects explained that their commissioned work never went beyond the conceptual stage: "hok produced marketing brochures including images and text, and eventually they will do what they want with it." She confessed to a personal moral crisis after it became apparent the client simply wanted to buy "a picture or an ideology of Americanness."[32] Ocean Paradise advertisements in the Beijing subway stated that the "famous U.S. architecture firm hok" had designed their plans. In 2002, a billboard next to the Ocean Paradise sales office announced in English: "Built on Lifestyle." Slogans on the walls around the construction site included: "We like the floating life. We enter this city at any time, and depart at any time. We like to be surrounded by art. We like the simple life."[33] Behind these walls, rural migrants, members of the "floating population," worked around the clock on apartment structures rising toward the sky.

远洋天地的开发商聘请总部位于圣路易斯的跨国建筑事务所 HOK（Hellmuth, Obata + Kassabaum）设计新的商品房小区。该项目的一位建筑师解释说，他们的委托工作从未超越概念阶段："HOK 制作了包含图像和文字的营销手册，最终他们会按自己的意愿处理。" 她承认，当客户显然只是想购买 " 一幅美国性的图景或意识形态 " 时，她经历了个人道德危机。[32] 北京地铁里的远洋天地广告称，其规划由 " 美国著名建筑事务所 HOK" 设计。2002 年，远洋天地售楼处旁的一块广告牌用英文宣布："Built on Lifestyle（建筑于生活方式之上）。" 工地四周墙上的标语包括：" 我们喜欢浮游的生活。我们随时进入这座城，随时离开。我们喜欢被艺术环绕。我们喜欢简单的生活。"[33] 在这些墙后，" 流动人口 " 中的农村移民夜以继日地建造着向天空升起的公寓楼。

The marketing team faced the challenge of attracting homebuyers to an area still considered the city's industrial outskirts. The cosred assistant general manager in charge of marketing, Xu Qian, had started out as an architect and interior designer. On an early visit to the Ocean Paradise site, Xu took photographs as bulldozers knocked over factory walls. He was moved by the emotional response of female textile workers witnessing the demolition: "I felt that perhaps this history was in our hands, at least that this piece of land would be rewritten by us."[34] This transformation was necessary, Xu explained. The fabric produced in the No. 3 Cotton Mill was too coarse and had no market value. "We must now link tracks again with the world and participate in global competition. With the contradictions that unfold, many interesting things also emerge." He thought about filming a documentary or scripting a television drama based on the social change he oversaw or continuing his photographic documentation as a study in contrasts. Believing in the necessity of economic readjustment, he yet pondered what cultural or humanizing elements might come out of the process. He harbored an affective attachment to past forms of sociality, but even more so to the epic melodrama of inevitability.

营销团队面临的挑战是吸引购房者来到仍被视为城市工业郊区的地区。负责营销的中远房地产开发公司总经理助理 Xu Qian 最初是建筑师和室内设计师。在早期一次造访远洋天地工地时，Xu Qian 拍下了推土机推倒工厂围墙的照片。他被女纺织工目睹拆除时的情感反应所打动：" 我觉得也许这段历史掌握在我们手中，至少这片土地将被我们改写。"[34] 他解释说，这一转变是必要的。国棉三厂生产的布料太粗糙，没有市场价值。" 我们现在必须重新与世界接轨，参与全球竞争。随着矛盾展开，许多有趣的事物也出现了。" 他考虑过拍摄纪录片或根据自己所见证的社会变化编写电视剧，或继续以摄影记录为对比研究。他相信经济调整的必要性，却也在思考这一过程可能产生什么文化或人性化元素。他对过去的社会交往形式怀有情感依恋，但更依恋那种不可避免性的史

On a tour of the United States, Xu Qian and his colleagues had been impressed by New York's soho and other urban industrial zones turned into art districts. Standing in front of the remaining shell of the No. 3 Cotton Mill's New Great Factory, Xu had the vision to preserve it as a cultural attraction. He considered the possibility of public works projects such as a textile factory museum or a school for the children of laid-off workers, but these proved too complicated in terms of government bureaucracy. His team also had to convince cosred leaders, who saw only a dilapidated factory building, of its value. They debated transforming it into a restaurant, disco, supermarket, dance school, or furniture showroom.[35] Xu's vision of cultural cultivation as an indirect benefit won out.

在一次美国之行中，Xu Qian 和同事对纽约苏荷区及其他由城市工业区改造而成的艺术区印象深刻。站在国棉三厂“新大厂房”的残壳前，他产生了将其保留为文化吸引物的愿景。他考虑过纺织厂博物馆或下岗工人子女学校之类的公共工程，但就政府官僚程序而言，这些过于复杂。他的团队还必须说服只看到一栋破旧厂房的远洋地产领导层认识到它的价值。他们争论过把它改造成餐厅、迪斯科舞厅、超市、舞蹈学校还是家具陈列室。[35] 他把文化培育视为间接收益的愿景胜出。

They decided to create the East Modern Art Center, which would provide space to Chinese contemporary artists for large-scale exhibitions of the sort that traditional museums did not support. Generating audiences for their work would increase the artists' visibility and value of their work. The center would also elevate the cultural milieu surrounding Ocean Paradise. In their logic, it would be a boon to both new homeowners and laid-off factory workers still residing in the area by providing them with an opportunity to learn about art and thereby raise their quality (suzhi). An expansive spirit of idealism shaped the guiding principles they outlined for a noncommercial organization: they would take and make no money from artists, and they would set no limits on the style of art exhibited. They even attempted to set up a cross-cultural exchange with MoMA in New York. They admired the fiscal management, channeling of corporate sponsorship, and international programming of the museum, although the complexity of MoMA's inspection and oversight guidelines and the high rate of insurance they required prevented any collaboration.[36]

他们决定创建远洋艺术中心，为中国当代艺术家提供空间，举办传统博物馆不支持的此类大型展览。为他们的作品创造观众，将提高艺术家的可见度和作品价值。该中心也会提升远洋天地周边的文化氛围。按照他们的逻辑，这对新购房者和仍住在该地区的下岗工人都有好处，因为它为他们提供了了解艺术的机会，从而提高其素质。一种宽广的理想主义精神塑造了他们为一个非商业组织制定的指导原则：不从艺术家那里收取或赚取任何费用，也不对展出的艺术风格设限。他们甚至试图与纽约现代艺术博物馆（MoMA）建立跨文化交流。他们钦佩该博物馆的财务管理、企业赞助渠道和国际项目策划，尽管 MoMA 审查监督准则的复杂性和高额保险要求使任何合作都无法实现。[36]

As excitement about the idea grew, city officials informed them of traffic codes requiring the Ocean Paradise entrance road to cut through the location of the New Great Factory. Yung Ho Chang, the internationally recognized Chinese architect who had already created a preliminary design for the art center, came up with a solution (figure 2.03): “An art center and a real estate office are to be located in an old textile factory building. However, a newly planned road slices right through the structure. The only way to avoid total demolition was to cut off half the existing building. As a consequence, a section of the industrial architecture is revealed as the elevation on the south side. To emphasize this explicit reality the rugged edge of the water drill surgery is left as it is; in other words the process of mutilation is preserved.”[37]

The Ocean Paradise marketing staff invited artists and reporters to a “salon” to generate ideas for the East Modern Art Center. Living Dance Studio choreographer Wen Hui proposed a dance performance for the center’s opening. She initially thought about using female dancers dressed as textile workers. Artists Song Dong and Yin Xiuzhen, who are husband and wife, also attended the gathering. Wen Hui phoned them afterward to ask if they wanted to work together with her and her husband, documentary filmmaker Wu Wenguang. As the four of them discussed ideas, Song Dong thought of involving mingong from the Ocean Paradise construction site. He wanted to set up an encounter between rural migrants and urban art enthusiasts, in which the line between audience and spectacle was unclear. Thinking about this idea in terms of a choreographic response to Beijing’s transformation, Wen Hui decided she wanted to bring its cultural and manual workers into physical contact.[38] Dancing with Mingong, the multimedia event that evolved from their collaboration, represents a momentary crystallization of these artists’ ongoing thought processes and experiments with particular media. It also represents a shift in logics of display. Once exemplary creators of what Gao Minglu termed “apartment art,” Song Dong and Yin Xiuzhen now found themselves creating pieces specifically for the site of a real estate development, in a way that involved critical reflection on their part but also supported developers’ marketing need for a media spectacle.

远洋天地的营销人员邀请艺术家和记者参加“沙龙”，为远洋艺术中心出谋划策。生活舞蹈工作室的编舞文慧提议为中心开幕做一场舞蹈演出。她最初想用打扮成纺织女工的女舞者。艺术家宋东和尹秀珍夫妇也参加了这次聚会。文慧后来打电话给他们，问他们是否愿意与她和丈夫、纪录片导演吴文光合作。四人讨论想法时，宋东想到让远洋天地建筑工地的民工参与进来。他想促成农村移民与城市艺术爱好者之间的相遇，其中观众与奇观之间的界限模糊不清。从以编舞回应北京转变的角度思考这一想法，文慧决定要让文化工作者和体力劳动者进行身体接触。[38]《与民工共舞》正是从他们合作中发展出的多媒体事件，代表这些艺术家持续思考过程与特定媒介实验的短暂结晶。它也代表了展示逻辑的转变。宋东和尹秀珍曾是高名潞所谓“公寓艺术”的典范创作者，如今却发现自己专门为房地产开发的场所创作作品，这种方式既包含他们的批判性反思，也支持了开发商对媒体奇观的营销需求。

The East Modern Art Center supplied the four artists with funds for materials and wages to hire thirty construction workers at thirty yuan per day, to rehearse for one week with Wen Hui's dancers, six Chinese and three foreign. They were told that the workers on the Ocean Paradise site were too busy, so Wu Wenguang contacted photographer Mao Ran, who had once worked as a subcontractor, and he found a group of mingong for hire. These men, largely from rural counties across Sichuan, stripped off their shirts and, following direction in improvisational exercises, moved through an empty space once filled with female textile workers (figure 2.04). Yin Xiuzhen assembled an installation piece that consisted of hanging lights and footpedal sewing machines, each sewing through one of Beijing's daily newspapers. Song Dong brought in piles of sand, on top of which he arranged architectural models borrowed from the Ocean Paradise sales office to create a miragelike diorama.[39] He photographed the workers' identity cards and temporary residence permits for a projection on the night of the performance.[40]

远洋艺术中心为四位艺术家提供了材料费和工资，以每人每天三十元雇佣三十名建筑工人，与文慧的舞者——六名中国人和三名外国人——排练一周。他们被告知远洋天地工地的工人太忙，于是吴文光联系了曾做过分包工的摄影师毛然，他找到了一群待雇的民工。这些男子大多来自四川各县农村，他们脱掉上衣，在即兴练习的指导下，穿过一个曾经挤满女纺织工的空旷空间（图 2.04）。尹秀珍组装了一件装置作品，由悬吊的灯和脚踏缝纫机构成，每台缝纫机缝穿一份北京的日报。宋东运来成堆的沙子，把从远洋天地售楼处借来的建筑模型摆在上面，营造出幻影般的立体布景。[39] 他拍摄了工人的身份证和暂住证，用于演出当晚的投影。[40]

Wu Wenguang filmed the rehearsals and final performance.[41] The resulting documentary records the demand of a worker on the first day: "Why are we here?" Wen Hui responded with a speech about how they, as artists, were interested in the former factory space as emblematic of a changing urban environment. On camera, she asserted that Beijing was being built by mingong, but very few Beijingers had a chance to actually talk to them. "You are at the very bottom of the social hierarchy, but Beijing has been built by you. You can give us advice. This performance gives you a chance to express your experience." The workers had a lot to express: "We came to Beijing to work, to make money, but sometimes people in Beijing hire us and then refuse to pay up after we've done the work. Will this performance help us get back these unpaid wages or get us residence permits or stop the police from arresting us? Since Beijing has gotten the Olympics, you really need us, but how will this performance help?" Flustered, Wen Hui turned to her assistants, "Is someone taking notes on this? I can't solve these problems."

吴文光拍摄了排练和最终演出。[41] 由此产生的纪录片记录了第一天一个工人的质问："我们为什么在这里？"文慧回答时讲到，他们作为艺术家对旧厂房空间作为变化中的城市环境的象征感兴趣。

她在镜头前断言，北京是由民工建造的，但很少有北京人有机会真正与他们交谈。“你们处在社会最底层，但北京是你们建起来的。你们可以给我们建议。这场演出给你们一个机会表达你们的经历。”工人们有许多话要说：“我们来北京干活，挣钱，但有时候北京人雇了我们，干完活却不肯付钱。这场演出能帮我们要回工钱吗，能给我们暂住证吗，能让警察不抓我们吗？北京申奥成功了，你们确实需要我们，可这场演出有什么用？”文慧慌了神，转向助手：“有人在做记录吗？这些问题我解决不了。”

When cosred officials learned about the details of the performance, they feared it would bring the wrong kind of attention to Ocean Paradise. They tried to get those involved to remove mingong from the title, but it had already been publicized to the media.[42] When the performance took place, on August 23, 2001, several hundred people turned out to join the divergent energies and intentions that intermingled that evening.

当远洋地产的官员得知演出的细节后，他们担心这会给远洋天地带来不利关注。他们试图让参与者把“民工”从标题中去掉，但消息已经向媒体公布。[42] 演出于 2001 年 8 月 23 日举行，数百人到场，加入了当晚相互交织的不同能量与意图。

As the performers, thirty rural migrant men joined by nine professional dancers, moved through the space, audience members ebbed and flowed around them. The dancers ran sporadically through the space, as if going through the paces of frenetic urban life. They came to a halt en masse. As a recording announced the arrival of a subway train, their heads slowly lifted together as they gazed upward. They formed two long parallel lines and threw bricks back and forth up the length of the building. They noisily rolled metal barrels across the concrete floor and over other dancers who had fallen to the ground.[43] Slides taken by Mao Ran of the messages of hope and despair that migrant workers write on construction site walls were projected on a column. Song Dong's video Broken Mirror (1999) was screened on a corner wall. Each segment of this piece opens with a Beijing street scene—an old alleyway, local market, or park. As a hammer hits the surface, the viewer realizes it is a reflection in a mirror. With each strike of the hammer, the scene ripples until the mirror finally shatters, revealing what lies across the street, or behind the mirror: the high-rise buildings of a rapidly modernizing Beijing. In another corner, the shirtless mingong formed a human screen with their bodies onto which Song Dong's video of their identity documents was projected. They formed human chains, each with hands on the back of the person in front of them, with the lead person pushing a newspaper through one of the sewing machines in Yin Xiuzhen's installation. Their interaction with these material objects conveyed a sense of history in the making, and the destruction and displacement involved in the process. The predominantly male corporeality of the performance reinforced the marginalization of demobilized women whose labor had once built and run the factory.[44] The event ended with the sung call and response of Lao Wei's village tune: "Flowers are covering the branches.... I am the only one alone." The mingong presented bricks to random members of the audience, who received them with a mixture of laughter, puzzlement, graciousness, and discomfort.

表演者——三十名农村来的男子和九名职业舞者——在空间中移动时，观众在他们周围潮汐般流动。舞者不时狂乱地跑过空间，仿佛经历着疯狂城市生活的步伐。他们集体停下。录音宣布地铁列车进站，他们的头一起缓缓抬起，向上凝视。他们排成两条长长的平行线，沿着整栋建筑来回扔砖。他们喧闹地把金属桶滚过混凝土地面，滚过已经倒地的其他舞者。[43] 毛然拍摄的民工在工地墙上写下希望与绝望话语的幻灯片被投射到一根柱子上。宋东的录像《破镜子》（1999）在角落墙面上放映。这件作品的每一段都以北京街景开场——旧胡同、本地市场或公园。当锤子击打表面

时，观众意识到那是镜子中的倒影。锤子每敲一下，景象便泛起涟漪，直到镜子最终碎裂，露出街对面或镜子后面的景象：迅速现代化的北京的高楼大厦。在另一个角落，光膀子的民工用身体组成人屏，宋东拍摄的他们的身份证件录像被投射其上。他们组成人链，每个人把手搭在前面那人的背上，领头者把一份报纸送入尹秀珍装置中的一台缝纫机。他们与这些物品的互动传达出一种历史正在形成的感觉，以及过程中涉及的破坏与流离失所。演出以男性为主的身体性强化了下岗女工的边缘化——她们的劳动曾经建造并运转这座工厂。[44] 演出在老魏村歌的唱和呼应中结束：“花儿盖满了枝头……只有我孤身一人。”民工把砖头送给随机选中的观众，观众以笑声、困惑、礼貌和不安混合回应。

The Limits of Art Center Site Specificity

来源位置：97

In coverage of the East Modern Art Center's inaugural event, reporters struggled to describe its overall effect, even as the messy chaos of it captured the oversized, hardscrabble ethos of contemporary Beijing; they described the mingong as earnest and moving; they lauded the status artists had granted them, while recognizing it would be as ephemeral as the hail that fell that night.[45] The physical contact between worldly urbanites and exploited migrant workers disrupted any easy romanticization of rural folk. The responses of various stakeholders in the project revealed tensions over the purpose of art exhibition in showcase Beijing. Xu Qian conceded that the performance expressed contradictions between people from different classes and backgrounds but concluded, "What effect did it have? It didn't make me feel relaxed or happy."[46] Song Dong reflected on the limits of artists to effect social change: "Although you could say that we employed mingong and also touched, moved, and mixed with mingong, we're certainly no saviors.... I felt that after it was over, they still had their lives, and we had ours. It's not like what a lot of the media reported, that we had given mingong dignity, or raised them to that level. They already had dignity."[47] Xu Qian's assistant in charge of art center logistics quit her job two months after Dancing with Mingong. She compared her departure, to work for a transnational software company, to breaking up with a lover who had laid waste to her passion. If she had it all to do over, she would focus more on the relationship between art and economics, in terms of cultivating sustainable patronage, instead of using the center simply as a means of generating publicity.[48] Graphic designer Wei Lai, a principal consultant on the project, placed blame on the artists who failed to thank or even mention Ocean Paradise Real Estate in their press interviews: "In the company we were suddenly seen as having bad judgment. The voices of everyone's criticism flew. Why did you want to preserve that factory? Why did you want to create an art center in that factory? Why did you create this kind of performance in that art center?"[49]

在关于远洋艺术中心首展的报道中，记者们难以描述其整体效果，尽管其中混乱的喧闹抓住了当代北京那种过度、艰辛的精神；他们把民工描述为真挚感人；他们称赞艺术家赋予民工的地位，同时意识到那将像当晚落下的冰雹一样短暂。[45] 世界性城市居民与被剥削的外来民工之间的身体接触，打破了任何对农村人的轻松浪漫化。项目各方利益相关者的反应，揭示了围绕展示北京艺术展览目的的紧张。Xu Qian 承认，这场演出表达了不同阶级和背景的人之间的矛盾，但总结道："它有什么效果？它没让我感到轻松或快乐。"[46] 宋东反思艺术家推动社会变革的限度："虽然你可以说我们雇用了民工，也接触、感动并与民工混合在一起，但我们当然不是救世主……我觉得演出结束后，他们仍有他们的生活，我们有我们的。事情不像许多媒体报道的那样，说我们给了民工尊严，或把他们提升到那个层次。他们本来就有尊严。"[47] Xu Qian 负责艺术中心后勤的助理在《与民工共舞》两个月后辞职。她把自己去一家跨国软件公司工作，比作与一个毁掉了自己激情的情人分手。如果能重来，她会更关注艺术与经济的关系，培养可持续的赞助，而不是仅仅把中心当作制造宣传的手段。[48] 平面设计师 Wei Lai 是项目主要顾问，他把责任归咎于艺术家——他们在媒体采访中没有感谢、甚至没有提到远洋天地房地产："我们在公司里突然被认为判断力糟糕。大家的批评声四起。你们为什么想保留那座工厂？为什么想在工厂里建艺术中心？为什么在艺术中心做那种演出？"[49]

Was the goal for art to foster a humanizing aura of culture that would confer commodity value to real estate, and in the process to Chinese contemporary artworks? To dissolve museum walls and call into question their power to create and conflate economic and aesthetic value? Or to incite debate and change related to issues of social inequality and segregation created by urban renewal projects? In the aftermath of Dancing with Mingong, cosred leaders refused to fund any more art activities. They simply rented the space to interested parties. Eight subsequent exhibitions and performances took place at the East Modern Art Center: Trip to Kunlun, a performance by the Beijing Modern Dance Group; Fantasia, an exhibit of contemporary art from China, Japan, and Korea; What a Wonderful World, an exhibit and performance created by artist Wang Nengtao; Run, Jump, Crawl, Walk, an exhibit of Chinese contemporary art; Witness to Growth, a solo exhibit of paintings by Yu Hong; DV Life, a youth digital video exhibit; The New Middle Class: Germany 1989–2000, an exhibit of photographs by Regina Schmeken sponsored by the Goethe Institute in Beijing; and Synthetic Reality, an exhibit of Chinese video art.

艺术的目的是培养一种人性化的文化光环，赋予房地产以商品价值，并在此过程中赋予中国当代艺术以商品价值吗？是消解博物馆的围墙，质疑其创造并混淆经济与审美价值的力量吗？还是激发关于城市更新项目造成的社会不平等与隔离问题的辩论和改变？《与民工共舞》之后，远洋地产领导层拒绝再资助任何艺术活动。他们只是把空间出租给有兴趣的各方。此后在远洋艺术中心举办了八场展览和演出：《昆仑之旅》，北京现代舞团演出；《幻想曲》，中国、日本和韩国当代艺术展；《多么美好的世界》，艺术家王能涛创作、演出；《跑、跳、爬、走》，中国当代艺术展；《目击成长》，喻红油画个展；《DV 生活》，青年数字影像展；《新中产阶级：德国 1989—2000》，歌德学院（北京）赞助的雷吉娜 • 施梅根摄影展；以及《合成现实》，中国录像艺术展。

None of these exhibits were site-specific in the way Dancing with Mingong had been, with the artists creating work that responded directly to the physical and historical space. The East Modern Art Center did, however, attract ambitious independent curators because it provided them with a large, museumlike space where experimental artworks could be displayed without the official imprimatur or level of oversight associated with staid institutions like the National Art Museum of China Art. A primary goal for Zhang Li, curator of Run, Jump, Crawl, Walk, was to develop a local audience for Chinese contemporary artists' embodied explorations of their social environment.[50] It would be an oversimplification of the many factors involved in curatorial decision-making to claim the space alone influenced the selection of artwork exhibited there, but the mixed nature of the site, the mutilated and unfinished feel of the center's architecture, the layers of its history still exposed and being struggled over, heightened the representational politics explored by many of the works shown. I highlight a few of these pieces to demonstrate how the intersection of urban planning, real estate, and art in new millennium Beijing shaped the lives of artists and sometimes became the subject of their art. These works reflect the encounter of socialist and market aesthetics, as well as the positions and desires within them of urbanites, the historical proletariat, and rural migrants. Several of these pieces have been exhibited in other locations, from commercial galleries to international museums, but in the East Modern Art Center they resonated with the space in a particular way. Not yet assigned a price or a place in an authorized narrative of China, poised at the edge of critique and co-optation, they contextualized the space as much as it contextualized the art.

这些展览都不像《与民工共舞》那样具有场域特定性，艺术家创作直接回应物理和历史空间的作品。然而，远洋艺术中心确实吸引了雄心勃勃的独立策展人，因为它为他们提供了一个大型、类

似博物馆的空间，可以在那里展出实验性作品，而不必获得官方批准，也不受中国美术馆等沉闷机构那种监督。张离作为《跑、跳、爬、走》策展人的主要目标之一，是为中国当代艺术家对其社会环境进行具身探索发展本地观众。[50] 声称仅凭空间便影响了展出作品的选择，会过度简化策展决策涉及的诸多因素，但该场所的混合性质、艺术中心建筑被切割和未完成的感觉、仍暴露在外并处于争夺中的历史层次，都强化了展出的许多作品所探索的表征政治。我着重介绍其中几件作品，以展示新千年北京城市规划、房地产与艺术的交汇如何塑造艺术家的生活，有时又成为其艺术主题。这些作品反映了社会主义与市场美学的相遇，以及城市居民、历史无产阶级和农村移民在其中的位置与欲望。其中几件作品曾在其他场所展出，从商业画廊到国际博物馆，但在远洋艺术中心，它们以特殊方式与空间产生共鸣。它们尚未被赋予价格或在被认可的中国叙事中的位置，徘徊于批判与被收编的边缘，它们既使空间语境化，也被空间语境化。

Artist Wang Nengtao's What a Wonderful World staged a larger-than-life party over the weekend of April 20–22, 2002. Through a cacophonous assemblage of people and materials, Wang explored the market-era maxim of material indulgence: chi he wan le (eat, drink, play, enjoy). The spectacle consisted of sixteen different sections—theater and music performances, on-the-spot food preparation, installations, documentary films, photographs, and paintings—arranged as a maze of excess through which audience members could wander.[51] For What a Wonderful Life, roast duck chefs carved meat for partygoers to enjoy. The discarded carcasses placed atop a mound of construction rubble mimicked Prospect Hill in central Beijing's Jingshan Park. A 360-degree, grey-toned panorama of the urban landscape, pieced together from photographs taken on Prospect Hill, surrounded the mountain of consumed ducks. In another scene, female performers in gold robes stood on tables draped in white and pumped their fists around a king in metallic pink. Behind them hung large digitally altered reproductions of propaganda posters from the Great Leap Forward. A young female collective farm worker grasps a stalk of wheat and smiles above the slogan "Circle the globe to take root, sprout, blossom, yield fruit." The steely sweat-beaded face of a male factory worker is paired with the slogan "We will certainly surpass America."[52] In an installation titled Met Old Chap Marx in Paris, a poster of Karl Marx, an old camera, spilled wine, a student desk, a burned out hearth, and a poster with the lyrics to the Internationale sets a scene of cosmopolitanism different from that epitomized by Ocean Paradise. The bedroom scene in Wang's Dream World Music (figure 2.05) installation provides a similarly striking contrast with that in the soho model apartment at Urban Planning Museum. The clutter of old photographs, advertising images from the 1920s, socialist propaganda posters, work unit merit certificates, toys, and musical instruments that surround the plain white mattress on the floor presents a historical archive of dreams and emotions antithetical to the contemporary commodity apartment advertising image. The installation's affective pull on a certain generation of viewers accentuates the hollowness of the wonderful world of pursuing material pleasure.

艺术家王能涛的《多么美好的世界》在 2002 年 4 月 20 日至 22 日的周末举办了一场超乎现实的派对。通过人与物的喧闹组合，王能涛探讨了市场时代的物质放纵信条：吃喝玩乐（chi he wan le）。这场奇观由十六个不同部分——戏剧与音乐表演、现场备餐、装置、纪录片、照片和绘画——组成，排布成一座过剩的迷宫，观众可以在其中游荡。[51] 为《多么美好的生活》，烤鸭厨师为派对客人片鸭肉。被丢弃的鸭骨架堆在建筑瓦砾堆上，模仿北京市中心景山公园的景山。由在景山上拍摄的照片拼接而成的 360 度灰调城市全景，环绕着这座被吃掉的鸭子堆成的小山。在另一个场景中，身穿金色长袍的女性表演者站在铺着白布的桌子上，围绕一位金属粉色的国王挥舞拳头。她们身后挂着大幅数字修改的 " 大跃进 " 宣传画复制品。一位年轻的女性集体农庄社员握着一根麦穗微笑，下方标语是 " 围绕全球扎根、发芽、开花、结果 "。一位男性工人满面汗水、神情坚毅的脸庞，配

上标语“我们一定要超过美国”。[52] 在一件题为《在巴黎遇见马克思老兄》的装置中，卡尔·马克思的海报、一台旧相机、泼洒的葡萄酒、一张学生书桌、烧尽的壁炉，以及一张印有《国际歌》歌词的海报，布置出一个不同于远洋天地所象征的世界主义场景。王能涛《梦幻世界音乐》（图 2.05）装置中的卧室场景，与城市规划展览馆 SOHO 样板间形成同样鲜明的对比。旧照片、1920 年代广告图像、社会主义宣传画、单位奖状、玩具和乐器杂乱地环绕着地板上的素白床垫，呈现出一个与当代商品房广告形象相悖的梦想与情感历史档案。这件装置对某一代观众的情感引力，凸显了追求物质享乐的“美好世界”的空洞。

The other Chinese solo show held at the East Modern Art Center was Yu Hong's Witness to Growth, a series of thirty-four oil paintings, all self-portraits or intimate scenes with family and friends, one and sometimes two painted for each year of her life. While individual paintings from the series had appeared in group exhibits, this marked the first time they were exhibited as a complete series and with each painting juxtaposed with a media representation from the same year. For 1966, Yu pairs China Pictorial color photographs of Chairman Mao waving to soldiers in Tiananmen Square at the start of the Cultural Revolution with a painting after a black-and-white photograph of herself at six months, bundled and lying asleep in a pram outside in the sun. Twelve years later, the chosen China Pictorial photograph features Yu herself, sketching outside with three other students from the Beijing Children's Palace; in the paired painting, she poses in a park with her parents and younger sister for a family photograph. In 1996, Thirty Years Old (figure 2.06), the China Pictorial image has shifted to a dreamscape of mass consumer prosperity, a grid of identical new villas in suburban Beijing. In the accompanying paintings, the artist sits lost in thought in her studio, her two-year-old daughter napping on the sofa next to her; or just her daughter slumped asleep in an office chair in front of a large-than-life but seemingly inconsequential Mao portrait hanging on the studio wall. Yu's technically deft yet loose brushwork reflects her academy training in socialist realist painting. (She is the artist whose sketch of the head of David remained legendary among the next generation of cafa students.) Her paintings, however, depict melancholic introspection rather than idealized working class-struggle or hagiographic hero worship. They also present a contrast to the crisp media images, challenging the realism of photographic representation. The overall series represents historical reflection and interjects individual subjectivity into collective history and fantasy. The woman in these paintings does not, in heroic worker, mother, or consumer pose, represent the nation or promote a real estate developer's vision of domestic bliss. She conveys the philosophical ambivalence of a witness. Her auratic presence is heightened by the layers of history overturned and memorialized in the very architecture of the East Modern Art Center.

清晰的媒体图像形成对比，挑战摄影再现的现实主义。整个系列代表历史反思，把个体主体性插入集体历史与幻想之中。这些画中的女人没有摆出英雄工人、母亲或消费者的姿态，不代表国家，也不宣传开发商对家庭幸福的愿景。她传达出一位见证者在哲学层面上的矛盾心态。她的灵光式存在感，因远洋艺术中心建筑本身所掀翻并纪念的层层历史而增强。

Several pieces in Zhang's Run, Jump, Crawl, Walk present explorations of a rapidly changing social environment amplified by the history of the exhibition site, its embodied labor, fantasies, and wounds. The digital photographs in Chen Lingyang's 25:00 lightbox series illuminate an oversize female nude, the artist's own body, in panoramic Beijing nightscapes (plate 2). She harbors an interior realm of possibility that looms within the "real" world, while also exposing human vulnerability on a monumental scale. In Zhuang Hui's June 25th, Cha Shan Town, an arresting scene appears amid a dramatically lit, life-size diorama. Artificial grass and flowers sprout from the ground. Against a backdrop of white clouds and blue sky, a thick pink cotton cloud hovers. Framed by a grove of bamboo, a brightly dressed female mannequin stumbles forward with a hand to her face. Her eyes are closed and fake blood drips from them, down her fingers, and onto her orange top. Zhuang created this installation based on a story he read in a tabloid newspaper from southern China, where factories produce transnational consumer goods. Gang members had gouged out the eyes of a female rural migrant factory worker to sell on the black market for human body parts. The technicolor promise of the city produces surreal extremes of stratification and commodification.

张离《跑、跳、爬、走》中的几件作品探索了迅速变化的社会环境，这种探索被展览场所的历史、其具身劳动、幻想和创伤所放大。陈羚羊《25:00》灯箱系列中的数码照片，以全景式北京夜景照亮一个超大女性裸体——艺术家自己的身体（图版 2）。她怀有一个内在的可能性领域，它隐现于“真实”世界之中，同时以纪念碑式的尺度暴露人的脆弱。在庄辉的《六月二十五日，茶山镇》中，一个引人注目的场景出现在戏剧性灯光下、真人大小的立体布景中。人造花草从地面生长出来。在白云和蓝天的背景前，悬着一团浓密的粉色棉云。在一丛竹子的框景中，一个穿着鲜艳的女性人体模型一只手掩面，踉跄向前。她双眼紧闭，假血从眼中滴下，顺着手指流到橙色上衣上。庄辉根据他在南方一份小报上读到的故事创作了这件装置：那里的工厂生产跨国消费品。帮派成员挖出一名农村女工的眼睛，在黑市上出售人体器官。城市色彩斑斓的承诺，制造出超现实的分层与商品化极端。

All of these pieces contain holdover socialist sentiments, embedded in the artists' archival materials, stylistic predispositions, and subject matter, yet were exhibited within the reform-era logic of display in a city where planners and developers strove to command world attention. In contrast with the marketing mission that justified cosred investment in the art center, these artists found in the unfinished, layered aspects of the site a space of imagination. It opened an optical unconscious, inspiring theatrical scenario. Their pieces work through the contradictions embodied in the site's comingled collectivist and privatized ideologies. Cosmopolitan middle-class lifestyle was built on but also haunted by the displacement of a female urban proletariat and the exploitation of a floating population of rural migrants. This type of site-specific artistic rumination did not align with the vision of Ocean Paradise developers. Their decision to rent out the art center was an interim step toward their next more definitive move.

所有这些作品都含有残留的社会主义情感，嵌入艺术家的档案材料、风格倾向和题材之中，却是在改革时期的展示逻辑中展出——在一个规划者和开发商力求吸引世界目光的城市里。与为远洋地产投资艺术中心提供理由的营销使命相反，这些艺术家在场地的未完成、多层次特质中发现了一个想象空间。它打开了一种视觉无意识，激发出戏剧性场景。他们的作品处理场地混杂的集体主义与私有化意识形态所体现的矛盾。世界性中产阶级生活方式建立在对女性城市无产阶级的迁置和对农村流动人口剥削的基础上，同时又被它们萦绕。这种场域特定的艺术沉思与远洋天地开发商的愿景并不一致。他们决定把艺术中心出租，是迈向下一步更决定性行动的中途站。

Just over two years after the East Modern Art Center was inaugurated with a performance that involved brick throwing, a bulldozer tore into its glass-box renovation of the New Great Factory. Lumbering machines methodically reduced it to the same fate No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3 Cotton Mills had met, and then hauled away the rubble of bricks, concrete, and rebar. In its first phase, the Ocean International Center built on the site included four glassy high-rise towers, the tallest of which rose to thirty-three floors. The towers housed several major Chinese banks, a conference and business center, service apartments, and office space leased by companies such as GlaxoSmithKline, Hewlett-Packard, and Fujitsu. The second phase added two more office buildings connected by a retail mall.[53] In my interviews with various participants in the East Modern Art Center experiment, I heard different stories. Some told me that if it reaped enough success, it would survive into the future. Others told me that it was always intended to be temporary. It eventually became a kind of installation or performance piece in and of itself.

远洋艺术中心以一场涉及扔砖的演出开幕两年多后，一台推土机冲进了它对新大厂房的玻璃盒式改造。笨重的机器有条不紊地将其化为国棉一厂、二厂、三厂曾遭遇的同样命运，然后运走砖块、混凝土和钢筋的瓦砾。在其第一阶段，建在原址上的海洋国际中心包括四座玻璃高层塔楼，最高者达三十三层。塔楼容纳数家中国大型银行、会议与商务中心、服务式公寓，以及葛兰素史克、惠普和富士通等公司租用的办公空间。第二阶段又增加两栋由零售商场连接的办公楼。[53] 在采访远洋艺术中心实验的各参与者时，我听到不同的说法。一些人告诉我，如果它取得足够成功，就会延续到未来。另一些人告诉我，它从一开始就打算是临时的。它最终本身成了一件装置或行为作品。

The East Modern Art Center preceded new art districts like 798, a Bauhaus-style electronics complex originally built in the 1950s with East German assistance.[54] When artists and gallerists began renting studio and exhibition space in factories there, it became Beijing's next center of contemporary art activity, and just as soon was embroiled in debates about art's commercial cooptation, as well as plans to demolish the factory buildings and develop a high-tech zone. After a protracted struggle between artists and leaders of the landholding company, the area received official designation as the Dashanzi Art District just before the 2008 Olympics.[55]

远洋艺术中心先于 798 等新艺术区出现。798 是一座包豪斯风格的电子工业建筑群，最初于 1950 年代在东德援助下建成。[54] 当艺术家和画廊经营者开始在那里租用工作室和展览空间时，它成为北京下一个当代艺术活动中心，并很快卷入关于艺术商业收编的争论，以及拆除厂房、发展高科技园区的计划。经过艺术家与土地持有公司领导层的长期斗争，该地区在 2008 年奥运会前不久被正式指定为大山子艺术区。[55]

Dancing with Mingong likewise marked another trend in the Beijing contemporary art world: in 2001–2, a number of artists produced work focused on rural migrant workers.[56] Several of these artists described an initial identification with mingong, as they also lived in relatively poor and disenfranchised conditions on the margins of showcase Beijing.[57] Then as new exhibition and market opportunities arose, they gained new cultural capital and sometimes financial security. Their artistic representation of mingong as emblematic of new forms of social inequality often led to conflicts over ethics or fair compensation. A 2003 group show titled Together with Migrants, curated by Yang Xinyi and featuring the work of fifteen artists, epitomized this phenomenon. Organized in conjunction with a unesco project for rural poverty reduction, the exhibit ran for one week in the newly opened Today Art Museum. The disjuncture between social justice work and contemporary art exhibited in a space like the Today Art Museum emerged in a comment by Huang Ping, a sociologist affiliated with the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences and a collaborating member of the unesco project. He bluntly stated, "We are not that happy with the exhibit. We want to show what the migrants contribute to society, but the artists have only depicted their poverty and desperation."[58]

《与民工共舞》同样标志着北京当代艺术界的另一趋势：2001 至 2002 年，多位艺术家创作了聚焦农村外来民工的作品。[56] 其中几位艺术家描述了他们最初对民工的认同，因为他们也生活在展示北京边缘相对贫穷、权利被剥夺的条件下。[57] 随着新的展览和市场机会出现，他们获得了新的文化资本，有时也获得经济保障。他们对民工作为社会不平等新形式象征的艺术再现，常常引发关于伦理或公平报酬的冲突。2003 年由 Yang Xinyi 策展、十五位艺术家参展的群展《与移民同在》集中体现了这一现象。该展览与联合国教科文组织的一个农村减贫项目合作举办，在新开馆的今日美术馆展出一周。社会正义工作与在今日美术馆这类空间展出的当代艺术之间的脱节，体现在中国社会科学院社会学家、教科文组织项目合作成员黄平的评论中。他直言："我们对展览不太满意。我们想展示移民对社会的贡献，但艺术家只描绘了他们的贫穷和绝望。"[58]

The Today Art Museum, conceived as part of the Pingod real estate development on the southern side of the cbd, appeared not long after the East Modern Art Center met its end.[59] The developers hired the same architect, Yung Ho Chang, to convert a heating plant on the site into a mixed-use sales center and art museum. His studio's approach to the renovation took into account the structure's planned obsolesce: "The mix of commercial and cultural activities is strategic although not entirely unique in Beijing. The facility's temporality means a very quick and low budget job."[60] Yet, over a decade later, the museum still stood, and was flourishing.

今日美术馆是作为中央商务区南侧苹果社区房地产项目的一部分而构思的，在远洋艺术中心终结后不久出现。[59] 开发商聘请同一位建筑师张永和，将场地上的一座供热厂改造成混合用途的售楼处和美术馆。他的工作室对改造的处理考虑了这座建筑按计划将被淘汰的临时性质："商业与文化活动的混合具有战略性，尽管在北京并非完全独特。设施的临时性意味着工程必须非常快速且预算很低。"[60] 然而十多年后，美术馆依然矗立，并且蓬勃发展。

If the East Modern Art Center left itself open to site-specific experimentation or resonance, the Today Art Museum founders cultivated a progrowth culture industry scheme, in which the creation of commodity value for real estate and for contemporary art works were closely intertwined. The design of the museum's galleries followed the international white cube standard. The museum had a gift center, bookstore, and café, as well as membership and educational outreach programs. It offered storage space to contemporary art collectors. In 2009, it counted Mercedes-Benz, Montblanc, and Shanghai Tang among its many corporate sponsors. In 2010, Credit Suisse underwrote a Today Art Award. Several art magazines were published under the Today imprint, including Dajia (Master) and Caijing (Finance). The former identified and featured the work of "master" artists, often those included in the museum's collection. The latter provided market analysis, including recent auction statistics for different categories ranging from porcelain to classical ink painting to contemporary art.

如果说远洋艺术中心为场域特定实验或共鸣敞开大门，今日美术馆的创办者则培育了一种亲增长的文化产业方案，为房地产和当代艺术创造商品价值在其中紧密交织。美术馆展厅的设计遵循国际白色立方标准。馆内设有礼品中心、书店和咖啡馆，还有会员及教育推广项目。它为当代艺术收藏家提供存储空间。2009 年，其众多企业赞助商包括梅赛德斯-奔驰、万宝龙和上海滩。2010 年，瑞信赞助了 " 今日艺术奖 "。今日品牌旗下出版了几本艺术杂志，包括《大家》和《财经》。前者识别并推介 " 大师级 " 艺术家的作品，往往是美术馆收藏中的艺术家。后者提供市场分析，包括从瓷器、古典水墨到当代艺术等不同类别的近期拍卖统计。

It might be argued that the success of the Today Art Museum represents the maturing of contemporary art institutions in China. It certainly demonstrates Chinese adoption of the globalizing model of corporate art intervention analyzed in Britain and the United States by Chin-tao Wu.[61] Under Thatcher and Reagan in the 1980s, public arts funding was increasingly transferred to the corporate sector, which in return was able to raise its public image by trading in cultural respectability. Pingod leaders sent several of the Today Art Museum staff on a research tour of Western museums to study exactly this management model.[62] The museum they created succeeded in laying claim to a smooth story of bourgeois arrival that contained unruly histories. It did not threaten or invite critique of Beijing as a growth machine in the making.

或许可以辩称，今日美术馆的成功代表中国当代艺术机构的成熟。它无疑证明中国采纳了吴金桃在英美分析过的企业介入艺术的全球化模式。[61] 在 1980 年代撒切尔和里根治下，公共艺术资助越来越多地转移到企业部门，企业则借助文化带来的声望来提升自身公众形象。苹果社区的领导者派今日美术馆的几位员工赴西方博物馆考察，专门研究这种管理模式。[62] 他们创建的美术馆成功地把自己包装成一部资产阶级登场的平滑叙事，掩饰了其中桀骜不驯的历史。它既未威胁北京作为一部正在形成的增长机器的运作，也未引发对这一进程的批判。

The East Modern Art Center circa 2001 represented a moment in a landscape of museum transformation. It provides a window onto the messy, nascent relationship of state-led urban renewal, privatized real estate, and art. Its embodiment of other ways of being in the city and in the world eventually became part of the wreckage left in the Ocean Paradise wake. Draw into this nexus, artists grappled with how to respond, aesthetically and practically, to the social changes reflected in the art world politics of their everyday lives. They adapted to the new ideological context of cultural industry development in Beijing but not without a struggle over the politics of form. Aesthetics have material consequences because they have the power to promote or puncture particular visions, and artists work at precisely this juncture. The frequency with which Chinese contemporary artists inserted themselves into their own work seems in part a meditation on the question of how their labor and skills fit into this changing landscape.

2001 年前后的远洋艺术中心代表了博物馆转型景观中的一个时刻。它提供了一个窗口，让人看到国家主导的城市更新、私有化房地产与艺术之间混乱而初生的关系。它所体现的在城市与世界中生活的其他方式，最终成为远洋天地身后废墟的一部分。艺术家被卷入这一交织网络，努力思考如何在美学上和实践中回应艺术界日常政治所反映的社会变化。他们适应了北京文化产业发展的新意识形态语境，但并非没有形式的政治斗争。美学具有物质后果，因为它们有能力推动或刺破特定愿景，而艺术家正是工作在这个接合点上。中国当代艺术家频繁把自己插入作品，似乎部分是对其劳动和技能如何融入这一变化景观的沉思。

At the Today Art Museum, art was recognized as worth collecting as a financial investment. It contributed to creating a distinct middle-class cultural sensibility for the Pingod real estate development. A 2007 billboard outside of the construction site announced: “cbd • Art Gallery Street • Hotel Lifestyle • Home. Today Art Museum, Asia’s largest Chinese contemporary art gallery, is uniquely linked with the world.” When artists whose engagement with site-specific art once led them out of the studio and into public spaces began to create installations and performances specifically for privatized museum sites like this one, they moved away from a public counteraesthetics.

In 2007, in the shadow of the partially constructed Koolhaas-designed cctv Headquarters, preparations were underway to demolish the only socialist-era apartment building still standing on the site. Most of the residents had already moved out, but several families refused to leave. With property-based activism on the rise, protest strategies aimed to delay demolition and gain better relocation compensation.[63] Holdouts became known as “nail households” because they stood out in their resistance to being hammered down into submission. Those in the cctv case had painted graffiti on an exterior wall facing the traffic-congested Third Ring Road. Their slogans, whose aesthetics draw on Chinese traditions of big character posters and socialist murals, included:

Adam Chau has analyzed the painting of the big character chai (demolish) on the walls of buildings slated for demolition as a text act, a visual form of expression shot through with power.[65] The formal characteristics of the sign do not just communicate; they act on their audience. This is visual symbolism of a most site-specific nature, as are protests that use the same socialist form of big-character painting against the authoritarian power of urban renewal. On a wall outside the cctv site, blue graffiti painted over a white chai sign spilled outside the circle surrounding the character and declared, “protect!” (figure 2.07). While observers of these emerging forms of activism, which also include protests by laid-off workers seeking more just compensation, see them as a hopeful trend in making growth machine social costs more visible, they also acknowledge that communities often have few resources to rely on in the face of deve-lopment backed by the government.[66]

Adam Chau 将待拆建筑墙上“拆”字的书写分析为一种文本行为、一种渗透着权力的视觉表达形

式。[65] 这一标志的形式特征不仅传达信息，还作用于观众。这是最具场域特定性的视觉象征，使用同一社会主义大字报形式的抗议针对城市更新的威权权力，也是如此。在央视工地外的一面墙上，覆盖白色“拆”字的蓝色涂鸦溢出字符周围的圆圈，宣告“保护！”（图 2.07）。这些新兴行动主义形式也包括下岗工人争取更公正补偿的抗议。观察者将它们视为让增长机器的社会成本更可见的充满希望的潮流，但他们也承认，面对政府支持的发展，社区往往几乎没有资源可依靠。[66]

When artists explored new opportunities for display created by real estate developers, they ran up against limitations to represent in any politically effective way the inherent inequality of showcase Beijing. As Song Dong reflected, “We’re no saviors.” When city residents attempted to resist the imprint of urban development plans on their homes and communities, their protests had little efficacy due to the relative weakness of community power. In terms of China’s booming museum system, this situation translated into few display opportunities independent from progrowth coalition development. Chinese urban planners concerned with the way these coalitions victimize the very people they claim to represent resist the channeling of their labor according to growth machine logic. Their call for planners to recognize the political nature of their work and to “link aesthetic imagination with the public interest” is one that like-minded artists might also heed.[67]

当艺术家探索房地产开发商所创造的新展示机会时，他们遭遇了限制：无法以任何政治有效的方式再现展示北京内在的不平等。正如宋东所反思的，“我们不是救世主。”当城市居民试图抵抗城市开发计划对其家园和社区的印记时，由于社区权力相对薄弱，他们的抗议收效甚微。就中国蓬勃发展的博物馆体系而言，这种情况意味着独立于亲增长联盟开发项目的展示机会寥寥无几。关心这些联盟如何伤害其声称代表的人们的中国城市规划者，抵制按照增长机器逻辑来引导他们的劳动。他们呼吁规划者认识自身工作的政治性质，“将审美想象与公共利益联系起来”——志同道合的艺术家或许也会听从这一呼吁。[67]

How might artists attuned to site-specificity develop a paradigm of community collaboration, on a deeper level than hiring mingong, as part of their practice? Remembering the “failure” of the East Modern Art Center enables historical consciousness about the changing role of museums in China’s capital and how they implicate artists, influence their practice, and frame their artwork. Its history smashed and buried on many levels, what remains is a museum that is neither snow globe nor bell jar, but an archive of alternative possibilities. Scale models of Beijing seductively promise a dreamworld of leisure, culture, and cosmopolitan distinction. They train sight lines in powerful ways, organizing migrant and aesthetic labor alike in their realization. How they meet the ground, however, can also set into motion other arcs of the imagination. The afterimage of a brick hurtling through space shatters their smooth surface into pieces.

艺术家若要敏锐地对待场域特定性，如何在比雇用民工更深的层面上发展一种社区合作范式，作为其实践的一部分？记住远洋艺术中心的“失败”，可以形成关于博物馆在中国首都角色变化的历史意识，以及它们如何牵连艺术家、影响其实践并框定其作品。它的历史在许多层面上被砸碎、掩埋，所留下的是这样一座博物馆：既不是雪花玻璃球，也不是玻璃钟罩，而是一座另类可能性的档案。北京的比例模型诱惑地许诺一个由休闲、文化和世界性区隔构成的梦想世界。它们以强有力方式训练视线，在实现过程中同样组织着移民劳动与审美劳动。然而，它们如何落地，也可以启动想象力的其他弧线。一块砖头在空中飞驰的残影，将它们的平滑表面击碎成片。

From late 2000 to 2002, I lived in a socialist-era, five-story brick building in Xicheng District. I rented my one-bedroom apartment from a woman named Art Soldier, who worked in the state film bureau. She and her husband had moved into a new commodity apartment in a nearby high-rise development. Meanwhile many of her former neighbors, who remained in the older work-unit housing, launched a variety of zhuangxiu projects. Zhuangxiu means to fix up or redecorate and became a craze that besieged the city. The sounds of the neighborhood permeated my reprieve from Beijing's streets: vendors' calls from the vegetable market outside the enclosed balcony where I hung laundry to dry; wind banging screens and hissing its way around window frames; the grunts of sex on the other side of my bedroom wall; the lonely tune of someone whistling in the dim, concrete stairwell. But more than any other sound, I awoke to that of drilling, hammering, and sawing. Entrepreneurs on the nearby thoroughfare renovated their shops and restaurants. Some boasted bright lights, shiny glass and metal, and synthetic color schemes. Others cultivated a more pastoral aesthetic, such as the restaurants whose managers hired folk artists to paint landscape murals on their exteriors. The character chai (demolish) showed up in broad swaths, its white paint dripping down walls, like a command for the city to translate its old appearance into something new.

从 2000 年底到 2002 年，我住在西城区一栋社会主义时期的五层砖楼里。我从一个名叫文艺兵的女人那里租下一套一居室公寓，她在国家电影局工作。她和丈夫已经搬进附近一栋高层楼盘的新商品房。与此同时，她的许多仍住在老旧单位宿舍的前邻居纷纷启动各种装修工程。装修的意思是修理或重新装饰，它成为一种围困城市的狂热。社区的声音渗入我从北京街头回到的喘息空间：封闭阳台外菜市场的叫卖声——我在那里晾衣服；风拍打纱窗、绕着窗框呼啸的声音；卧室墙另一侧的性爱呻吟；昏暗混凝土楼梯间里某人孤独的口哨曲调。但最常把我唤醒的，是钻孔、锤击和锯木的声响。附近大道上的店主翻新店铺和餐馆。有些以明亮的灯光、闪亮的玻璃和金属以及合成色彩为傲。另一些则培养更田园的审美，例如有些餐馆经理雇民间艺人在外墙绘制山水壁画。“拆”（chai）字大片出现，白漆顺着墙壁滴下，仿佛是命令这座城市把旧貌改写成新颜。

Aspirational dramas unfolded on the television screen in my darkened apartment, where I retreated after long days of commuting around the city for classes, interviews, and meetings. Amid Hong Kong soap operas of the rich and famous, South Korean family sagas, and Mainland dynastic costume dramas, I caught episodes of Wei Cheng when the ten-part series reran on China Central tv. Based on a 1947 novel by Qian Zhongshu, the adaptation first aired in 1991, gaining wide viewership and popularity. The title of the novel, translated as The Besieged City or Fortress Besieged, entered 1990s Chinese lexicon along with words like "stock market," "privacy," and "mba." It became a popular metaphor referring to marriage, feeling stuck, striving under false pretenses, and human dissatisfaction.[1] Qian's satirical novel, whose depiction of bourgeois life fell out of print under Mao, tells the story of urban middle-class Fang Hongjian. After frittering years away in Europe under the pretext of advanced study, he runs out of money, buys a fake doctoral diploma from the United States (the name of the granting institution transliterated into Chinese is Charlatan University), and returns to Shanghai in 1937 on the eve of World War II. Fang enters into one after another of failed relationships with women, who range from a fiancée in an arranged marriage to a female classmate who earned a Ph.D. in Europe before getting caught as a plagiarist. His continual longing for what he does not currently possess turns into an everyday tragicomedy of human isolation likened to the Chinese condition of Shanghai in the late 1930s, an extraterritorial city of surreptitious freedoms but one governed by foreign concessions and beset by the Japanese.

在我昏暗的公寓里，电视屏幕上上演着充满向往与追求的电视剧——那是我为上课、采访和会议在城市里奔波一整天后退守的地方。在香港富豪名流肥皂剧、韩国家庭史诗剧和内地古装剧之间，我赶上《围城》十集电视剧在中央电视台重播。该剧改编自钱锺书 1947 年的小说，1991 年首播，获得广泛收视和欢迎。小说标题被译作 The Besieged City 或 Fortress Besieged，与 " 股市 "" 隐私 " 以及 "MBA" 等词一起进入 1990 年代的中国词汇。它成为一个流行隐喻，指涉婚姻、受困感、在虚假前提下奋斗以及人的不满足。[1] 钱锺书的讽刺小说在毛泽东时代因描写资产阶级生活而绝版，讲述城市中产阶级方鸿渐的故事。他以进修访学为名在欧洲虚度数年，花光钱后从美国买了一张假博士文凭（授予学位的机构中文译名为 " 克莱登大学 "），于第二次世界大战前夕的 1937 年回到上海。方鸿渐接连卷入与女性的失败关系，从包办婚姻的未婚妻，到在欧洲获得博士学位、后来被抓出抄袭的女同学。他对当下所无之物的持续渴望，变成一部关于人际孤立的日常悲喜剧，被比作 1930 年代末上海的 " 中国处境 "——一座享有隐秘自由的治外法权城市，却由外国租界统治，并受日本侵扰。

The opening sequence of each television episode shows the original edition of Qian's book, followed by translations published in the United States, Soviet Union, France, Germany, Japan, and Taiwan. A voiceover intones, "People surrounded inside the city want to flee out, people outside of the city want to rush in; in the face of marriage or occupation, such is human desire." This series tagline alludes to the French proverb Qian used as epigraph to his novel: "Marriage is like a fortress besieged: those who are outside want to get in, and those who are inside want to get out."[2] Lost in this itinerary of translation is the uncanny way that Qian's title in Chinese provides a metaphor that resonates into both past and future. A literal translation of wei cheng is "surrounded cities," evoking images of the old walled imperial capital, the colonial city besieged by Western powers during the Opium Wars, the wartime city under Japanese control, the revolutionary city surrounded as in Mao's injunction by the purifying countryside, and the new millennial city rife with construction attempting to overcome this siege of history by "linking tracks with the world."[3]

每一集电视剧的片头都展示钱锺书小说的原版，以及在美国、苏联、法国、德国、日本和台湾出版的译本。旁白吟诵："城里的人想逃出去，城外的人想冲进来；面对婚姻或职业，人的欲望便是如此。"这句系列宣传语暗指钱锺书用作小说题记的法语谚语："婚姻像一座被围困的城堡：城外的人想冲进去，城里的人想逃出来。"[2] 在这一翻译旅程中失落的，是钱锺书的中文标题所提供的那种诡异隐喻力量——它同时回响于过去与未来。"围城"的字面翻译是"被包围的城市"，令人想起旧日有城墙的帝国首都、鸦片战争中被西方列强围困的殖民城市、战时受日本控制的城市、被毛泽东所谓具有净化作用的乡村所包围的革命城市，以及新千年里到处是建设、试图通过"与世界接轨"来克服这一历史围困的城市。[3]

Marriage enters the metaphorical conceit in relation to questions of fidelity and modernity. What should one believe in and remain loyal to: tradition, family, romance, revolution, socialism, capitalism, nation, or world? In the words of the docent in my neighborhood museum whose logic jumped from censorship to divorce to discrimination to immigration: you'd be a fool to believe someone would love you for your whole life. Wei cheng captures a sense of caution about the promise of any ideological arrangement.

婚姻进入这一隐喻构思，与忠诚和现代性的问题相关。人应当相信并忠于什么：传统、家庭、爱情、革命、社会主义、资本主义、民族，还是世界？用我家附近博物馆那位讲解员的话说——他的逻辑从审查跳到离婚，再到歧视，再到移民：你要是相信有人会爱你一辈子，那就是傻瓜。《围城》捕捉到对所有意识形态安排之承诺的警觉。

As I was pulled into serving as a Chinese-English interpreter in several transnational encounters between Chinese artists and curators from abroad, the phrase wei cheng wound its way into our discussions. Artists invoked it to describe their relationship with the international art market. Precariously balanced against their desire to "get out" was that of returning and gaining respect at home. As translators of Chinese and Western aesthetics, they might serve as exemplars of cosmopolitanism or become susceptible to accusations of excessive fidelity to one or another artistic tradition.

当我在中国艺术家与海外策展人的若干跨国相遇中被拉去担任中英口译时，"围城"一词蜿蜒进入我们的讨论。艺术家用它描述自己与国际艺术市场的关系。与"走出去"的渴望如履薄冰地相平衡的，是回来并在国内获得尊重的渴望。作为中国与西方美学的翻译者，他们可能成为世界主义的典范，也可能轻易被指责对某一艺术传统过度忠诚。

Serving as an interpreter put a new spin on the perennial if falsely dichotomous insider-outsider dilemma of ethnographers.[4] Did I share greater insider status with curators from the United States or with Chinese artists I'd spent nominally more time with? What were the ethics of translation that became part of curatorial selection?[5] Who might I betray in the exchange, given the disciplinary tension between art and anthropology, in which an anthropologist might be called on to interpret linguistic and cultural nuance but not artistic value? The more I became involved in these zones of cultural encounter, the more aware I grew of the transnational, nannü rules of the game and resulting exclusion of particular kinds of artists.[6]

担任口译员，为民族志学者由来已久却虚假二分的内外困境增添了新的转折。[4] 我与美国策展人，还是与名义上相处更久的中国艺术家，共享更多“内部人”身份？构成策展选择的翻译伦理是什么？[5] 鉴于艺术与人类学之间的学科张力——人类学家可能被要求解释语言和文化细微之处，却不被要求判断艺术价值——我可能在交换中背叛谁？我越深入这些文化相遇地带，就越意识到跨国性的男女游戏规则，以及由此对特定类型艺术家的排斥。[6]

Participants in these encounters struggled with the constraints of a world organized according to a nation-state system. This framework structured the institutions they represented, as well as the ones they aspired to be accepted by, or the ones they had trained in. These institutions included museums, cultural organizations, international exhibitions, and art academies, as well as embassies that supported cultural exchange projects and issued or denied visas for artists to travel. The curators and artists I interpreted for readily apprehended and passionately debated the legacy of colonialism and racism within these institutions. They articulated visions of minority cosmopolitanism, even as they silently reiterated other powerful social distinctions in making art worthy of the world stage. Taking on the task of the translator presented a unique opportunity for ethnographic participant-observation but also implicated me in the behind-the-scenes of cultural production. Within the circles of male artists who dominated the Chinese contemporary art scene, I learned about the girlfriends, Chinese and foreign, who had served as translators and cultural brokers. One artist had gone through so many that others jokingly referred to him as Lianhe Guo, or United Nations. At one point, in my weariness with the sexual innuendo that was part of the scene, I fantasized about creating a performance piece in a photography studio where I would invite male artists to take wedding photographs with me. These mental theatrics provided an outlet for my own aggravation but more importantly revealed multidirectional anxieties produced by striving to be of the world: a wariness of being used, of being someone's ticket in or out, of being judged inauthentic.

这些相遇的参与者挣扎于一个按民族国家体系组织的世界所施加的限制。这一框架结构了他们所代表的机构，也结构了他们渴望被其接纳的机构，或他们接受训练的机构。这些机构包括博物馆、文化组织、国际展览和艺术学院，也包括支持文化交流项目、为艺术家签发或拒发旅行签证的大使馆。我为其口译的策展人和艺术家轻易理解并激烈辩论这些机构内部的殖民主义与种族主义遗产。他们阐述少数者世界主义的愿景，却在让艺术配得上世界舞台的过程中，默默重申其他强大的社会区分。承担译者的任务，为民族志参与观察提供了独特机会，但也把我卷入文化生产的幕后。在主导中国当代艺术界的男性艺术家圈子里，我了解到那些充当翻译和文化中介的中外女友。一位艺术家的女友换得太频繁，其他人开玩笑称他为“联合国”。有时，我对场景中性暗示的厌倦达到顶点，便幻想创作一件行为作品：在一间摄影棚里，我会邀请男性艺术家与我拍摄婚纱照。这些脑内戏剧是我气愤情绪的出口，但更重要的是，它们揭示了努力“属于世界”所产生的多向焦虑：害怕被利用，害怕成为某人进入或离开的入场券，害怕被判断为不真实。

In the besieged city of zhuangxiu, efforts to make Beijing global and of foreign curators to find Chinese artists who would globalize their institutions, the artwork of Wang Yin highlights tensions in the debate about what counts as art. It translated styles like the folk murals outside restaurants near my apartment into global contemporary art. His experiments with authorship and originality also reflected post-Mao rearrangements of social relations and subjectivities around notions of labor, property, and community. In 2000, Wang Yin began working with a village artist from Henan Province. He hired the painter, who specialized in colorful motifs common in rural decorative murals, to work in his Tongzhou studio. The painter executed scenes from his craftsman's repertoire on stretched canvas or black flannel. In 2000, No. 7, his landscape combines mist-shrouded mountains, green valleys, lotus flowers, and modern high-rise buildings in the verdant distance. On top of this landscape, Wang Yin painted in broad, expressionist brushstrokes a large, grey-toned figure. His muscular mass reclines barefoot against the pine tree in the foreground, head jutting forward at an awkward angle. His body remains incompletely realized, with parts of the background, a spot of red and blotch of green, showing through a forearm and thigh. The painting presents an encounter of idioms from differently organized art worlds—decorative mural and modernist oil painting—each of which take away part of the other, in a pastiche recognized by the contemporary art market as the conceptual work of Wang Yin, not the anonymous painter who "prepared" his canvases.[7]

在装修围城、北京走向全球的努力，以及外国策展人寻找能使其机构全球化的中国艺术家之际，王音的作品凸显了关于什么才算艺术的辩论中的紧张。他的作品把我公寓附近餐馆外墙的民间壁画之类风格转译成全球当代艺术。他对作者身份与原创性的实验，也反映了毛泽东之后围绕劳动、财产和社区观念对社会关系与主体性的重新安排。2000 年，王音开始与一位来自河南的乡村画师合作。他雇这位擅长乡村装饰壁画中常见彩色图案的画师，在他的通州工作室工作。画师在绷好的画布或黑色法兰绒上绘制其工匠技艺中熟悉的场景。《2000 年，第 7 号》中的山水融合了云雾缭绕的群山、翠绿山谷、荷花和远处苍翠中的现代高楼。在这幅山水之上，王音以宽大、表现主义的笔触画了一个巨大的灰色调人物。他肌肉发达的身躯赤脚斜倚在前景的松树上，头以别扭的角度向前探出。他的身体仍未完全成形，背景的一部分——一块红色和一块绿色——从一条前臂和大腿处透出。这幅画呈现了来自不同组织方式的艺术世界的语汇相遇——装饰壁画与现代主义油画——彼此都消减了对方的一部分，形成一种被当代艺术市场认定为王音观念作品的拼贴，而非那位为其“准备”画布的匿名画师的拼贴。[7]

The base layer of Sandstorm (plate 8) presents a brightly pigmented tableau of traditional Chinese imagery: rushing waterfalls, a junk sailing down a river, a pagoda in the distance, soaring cranes symbolizing longevity. Wang has then obliterated the scene with blunt, thickly applied repetitive strokes in muted shades of brown that cover the entire canvas. The painting's title alludes to the massive sandstorm that enveloped Beijing in March 2002, the result of increasing desertification in China's northwest, obliquely referencing fraught relations between city and country and the politics of reduced visibility. A reverse layering seems to occur in Flower (figure 3.01), as peonies blossom over an abstract color field, although small details of drips and washes over the flowers suggest multiple, successive overpaintings. For this piece, Wang asked his village counterpart to execute a design of flowers receding to the horizon, creating a sense of deep perspectival space. The peony flickers between folk symbol of wealth and minimalist motif in dialogue with modernist ideas of abstraction, replication, and alienation. The hierarchical separation of manual and mental, rural and urban labor becomes manifest in a painting largely in the hand of one painter but under the direction and bearing the name of another.

《沙尘暴》（图版 8）的底层是一幅色彩明亮的中国传统意象图景：奔腾的瀑布、顺流而下的帆船、远处的宝塔、象征长寿的飞鹤。王音随后用钝拙、厚涂、重复的笔触，以柔和的棕色覆盖整幅画布，抹去这一场景。画名暗指 2002 年 3 月笼罩北京的大规模沙尘暴——中国西北日益严重的沙漠化的结果，迂回地指涉城乡之间紧张的关系和能见度降低的政治。《花》（图 3.01）中似乎发生了反向分层：牡丹在抽象色域上绽放，尽管花朵上的滴痕和晕染等小细节暗示多次连续的覆盖绘制。为这件作品，王音请他的乡村合作者绘制一幅向地平线退去的花卉图案，营造出纵深透视空间感。牡丹在民间财富象征与极简主义母题之间闪烁，与现代主义的抽象、复制和异化观念对话。脑力劳动与体力劳动、城市劳动与乡村劳动的等级分离，在一幅主要由一位画师动手、却由另一位指导并署名的画作中显露出来。

I first met Wang Yin while interpreting for a group of curators from the United States as they toured Beijing artists' studios. As Wang discussed his work, he spoke consciously about disrupting the myth of the autonomous artist, undermining notions of originality, and even making obvious the social economy of art by hiring a painter to work for him. The reassertion of the autonomous artist over the anonymous folk painter in his meeting with the curators remained a silent subtext. Wang's hand or conceptual input altered the paintings in a way that transformed them into globally recognized art, while the portability of works on canvas rather than walls enabled them to enter this system of exchange. In his 1942 "Talks at the Yan'an Conference on Literature and Art," Mao Zedong exhorted the nation's "cultural army" to stand with the people, to get to know them in order to represent China in its revolutionary struggle: "We must use what belongs to workers, peasants, and soldiers themselves, and therefore, the task of learning from workers, peasants, and soldiers comes before the task of educating them."[8] Wang reversed Mao's call that artists go to the countryside to learn from the people, hiring the people instead to come to his studio. This mode of cultural production drew on and painted over a socialist understanding of art as communal effort.

我第一次遇见王音，是在为一群美国策展人参观北京艺术家工作室时担任口译。王音谈论自己的作品时，有意识地讲到打破自主艺术家的神话、削弱原创性观念，甚至通过雇用一个画师为其工作，让艺术的社会经济机制变得显而易见。然而在与策展人会面时，自主艺术家相对于匿名民间画师的优越地位被再次确立，仍是无声的潜台词。王音的手或观念投入改变了画作，使其转化为全球认可的艺术；而画布作品相对于墙面作品的可携带性，使它们得以进入这一交换体系。1942年，毛泽东在《在延安文艺座谈会上的讲话》中号召全国的“文化军队”与人民站在一起，了解人民，以便在革命斗争中表现中国：“我们必须用属于工人、农民和士兵自己的东西，因此，向工人、农民、士兵学习的任务先于教育他们的任务。”[8] 王音颠倒了毛泽东要艺术家下乡向人民学习的号召，改而雇用人民来到他的工作室。这种文化生产方式挪用并覆盖了把艺术理解为集体努力的社会主义观念。

In her study of the translated modernity of early twentieth-century Chinese literature, Lydia Liu writes, "Strictly speaking, comparative scholarship that aims to cross cultures can do nothing but translate.... But leaving aside the marital trope of fidelity and the logocentric notion of truth—concepts that readily lend themselves to deconstructionist criticism—what else do we know or can we say about translation and its implications for cross-cultural understanding?"[9] This chapter considers her question in relation to Chinese contemporary art as a dialogic construction. The work of Wang Yin and the hired folk painter provides a visual metaphor for the formal, linguistic, and cultural mediations that occur in artistic production and valuation. It demonstrates the making of art as a process that involves multiple social actors but also the superimpositions, alterations, and erasures that result from their exchange.

刘禾在关于二十世纪初中国文学翻译现代性的研究中写道：“严格说来，旨在跨越文化的比较研究除了翻译之外别无他法……但是，暂且抛开忠实的婚姻隐喻和逻各斯中心的真理观念——这些概念很容易成为解构主义批评的对象——关于翻译及其对跨文化理解的含义，我们还能知道什么、还能说什么呢？”[9] 本章把她的问题放在中国当代艺术作为一种对话性建构的语境中考察。王音与受雇民间画师的作品，为艺术生产和评价中发生的形式、语言与文化中介提供了一个视觉隐喻。它表明艺术制作是一个涉及多重社会行动者的过程，也涉及他们在交换中造成的叠印、修改和擦除。

In the encounters I interpreted for, the curators looked at the work shown to them and dialogically, through statement and question, tried to frame the images in terms of their developing exhibit ideas. The artists, in turn, provided personal, historical, and cultural context for their work. In this interplay of linguistic and pictorial, a precursor to the relationship of art and wall text in a museum exhibit, the curators and artists looked and talked and mutually interpreted the art at hand. They also depended on my Chinese-English interpretation, and my subjectivity entered the discussion, innocuously in moments of "good" translation and disruptively in moments of "bad" translation. In the most egregious case of the latter, I expressed (in English only) frustration with an artist's use of sexualized female figures. My fatigue with the abundance of this type of imagery, exacerbated by recognition of very few female artists, wore through. The curators responded to my remark by pushing the artist to explain his use of this imagery. He gave short, elusive replies about sexual repression under Communism and desire unleashed in its aftermath. Later, one of the curators chastised me, saying that my tone of voice had caused the artist to shut down. When I later ran into the artist at exhibit openings, his antagonist stance made it clear that he too blamed me for interfering.

在我担任口译的相遇中，策展人观看展示给他们的作品，并通过陈述和提问进行对话，试图根据自己正在形成的展览思路框定图像。艺术家则反过来提供作品的个人、历史和文化背景。在这种语言与图像的相互作用中——它是博物馆展览中艺术与墙面文字关系的前身——策展人和艺术家观看、交谈，并相互阐释眼前的艺术。他们还依赖我的中英口译，而我的主体性进入了讨论：在“好”翻译的时刻无害，在“坏”翻译的时刻具有破坏性。后者的一个最恶劣案例，是我（只用英语）表达了对一位艺术家使用性化女性形象的不满。我对这类图像泛滥的厌倦，加之意识到得到认可的女性艺术家寥寥无几，终于按捺不住。策展人回应我的评论，逼艺术家解释他对这类图像的使用。他给出简短而含糊的回答，说这是共产主义下的性压抑及其后释放的欲望。后来，一位策展人斥责我，说我的语气让艺术家闭了嘴。后来我在展览开幕式上遇到这位艺术家时，他敌对的态度清楚表明，他也怪罪我干涉。

I was first drawn into the role of interpreter in April 2001, after asking an independent Chinese curator if I could follow along on the studio tours he often arranged for curators visiting from abroad. Frequently called on as a consultant on Chinese avant-garde art, Huang Du had recently served on advisory committees for biennials in the United States, Cuba, Argentina, and Italy.[10] For him, this work represented an important sideline to his decade-long employment as an editor at Meishu (Fine arts), the official journal of the Chinese Association of Artists. In a juggling act of professional identities, Huang promoted to his international colleagues the kind of art that Meishu had denounced in a series of articles that year criticizing nudity in performance art and other "immoral" forms of art. He enthusiastically spoke the language of European cultural theory, often dropping words in English like postmodern, simulacra, implosion, and intersubjectivity into conversations in Chinese. Huang Du invited me to join him and Philippe Vergne, curator of visual arts for the Walker Art Center in Minneapolis, through long days of Beijing studio visits. Vergne, originally from France, was on his first visit to China. He had four days to do initial research for a 2003 exhibit to feature artwork from Brazil, China, India, Japan, South Africa, and Turkey, part of a global initiative launched by the Walker in 1998. Huang managed conversation in English quite well, but as the first day progressed, he encouraged me to take on the task of interpreting between Vergne and the artists. Huang continued to weigh in on both sides, in English and Chinese.

我第一次被拉入口译角色是在 2001 年 4 月，当时我请求一位中国独立策展人，让我跟随他经常为海外来访策展人安排的工作室参观。黄笃经常被聘为中国先锋艺术顾问，最近刚担任美国、古巴、阿根廷和意大利双年展的顾问委员会成员。[10] 对他而言，这份工作是他在《美术》——中国美术家协会官方刊物——任职编辑十年间的一项重要副业。黄笃在职业身份之间耍杂技，向国际同行推介的正是《美术》那年在一系列文章中谴责的艺术：那些文章批评行为艺术中的裸体和其他 " 不道德 " 艺术形式。他热情地说着欧洲文化理论的语言，常在中文交谈中夹带 postmodern、simulacra、implosion、intersubjectivity 等英文词。黄笃邀请我和明尼阿波利斯沃克艺术中心视觉艺术策展人菲利普 • 韦尔涅一起，度过漫长数日的北京工作室参观。韦尔涅原籍法国，首次访问中国。他有四天时间为 2003 年一个将展出巴西、中国、印度、日本、南非和土耳其艺术的展览做初步研究——这是沃克中心 1998 年发起的全球计划的一部分。黄笃的英语交流能力相当不错，但第一天进行下去，他鼓励我承担韦尔涅与艺术家之间的口译工作。黄笃继续用中英文在两边发表意见。

Philippe Vergne introduced the future Walker show to the artists he met as one that would feature “non-Western” artists. In later catalogue texts, he and contributing colleagues refer to their organizing principle in terms of globality or globalization, citing theoretical influences ranging from Arjun Appadarai to Saskia Sassen, Homi Bhabha to Stuart Hall. Vergne balanced ideas developed by these scholars of modernity, urbanism, postcolonialism, and cultural studies with the concerns of the institution he represented in China and elsewhere in his research travels. The Walker Art Center, one of many foreign art institutions to send curators to China to learn more about its contemporary art scene, had a particular rationale for the exhibit that became How Latitudes Become Forms: Art in a Global Age (February–May 2003).

菲利普·韦尔涅向他遇到的艺术家介绍未来的沃克展览时，说它将展出“非西方”艺术家。在后来的图录文章中，他和参与撰稿的同事以全球性或全球化表述其组织原则，引用从阿尔君·阿帕杜莱、萨斯基娅·萨森到霍米·巴巴、斯图亚特·霍尔的理论影响。韦尔涅把这些现代性、城市主义、后殖民主义和文化研究学者的观念，与他所代表机构的关切相平衡——在中国以及其他研究旅行地也是如此。沃克艺术中心是众多派策展人来中国了解当代艺术现场的外国艺术机构之一，它对最终成为《纬度如何成为形式：全球时代的艺术》（2003 年 2 月—5 月）的展览有一套特定理由。

Museum staff and consultants, involved in their own discussion of what it meant to be a global city, wanted to better represent the diversity of Minneapolis. Kathy Halbreich, director of the Walker Art Center, writes: “Minneapolis is one of the nation’s most rapidly changing cities and is now more culturally, ethnically, and economically diverse than ever before.... To be a more locally engaged institution, we need to become more sensitive to the increasingly inter-connected world reflected in the demographics of our own community.”[11]

博物馆员工与顾问们参与各自关于何为全球城市的讨论，希望更好地呈现明尼阿波利斯的多样性。沃克艺术中心馆长凯西·哈尔布雷希写道：“明尼阿波利斯是全国变化最快的城市之一，如今在文化、族裔和经济上比以往任何时候都更加多元……要成为一个更深入本地参与的机构，我们需要对自身社区人口结构所反映的日益互联的世界更加敏感。”[11]

Huang Du and the artists with whom we met could converse fluently about international contemporary art trends. Philippe Vergne spoke easily about their work in relation to particular schools, movements, and forms, but he also strove to understand historical, cultural details less familiar to him but relevant to the artwork he encountered. Early in his visit, he asked an artist about his use of the color red by noting possible associations of it with objects like Mao’s Little Red Book. The artist purposefully ignored the political implications of the question by giving a strictly formal answer. I also found myself rephrasing in English expressions of frustration by artists like Zhu Jia, who remained suspicious of being chosen for international exhibitions simply for their nationality. I tried to provide context, ranging from decades-old debates about urban planning in Beijing to the political history of cabbage distribution, in relation to the works of art we viewed. Over dinner one evening, I translated the shared desire of Huang and Vergne for global art as a stage for artistic exchange where it was no longer necessary to flag artists by their national identities.

黄笃和我们见到的艺术家都能流畅谈论国际当代艺术趋势。菲利普·韦尔涅也能轻松地把他们的作品与特定流派、运动和形式联系起来，但他同时努力理解那些他不太熟悉、却与所遇作品相关的历史与文化细节。访问之初，他问一位艺术家为什么使用红色，提到红色可能与毛泽东的《红

宝书》等物有关。那位艺术家有意无视问题的政治含义，给出纯形式的回答。我也发现自己要用英语重述朱加等艺术家的不满——他们始终怀疑自己入选国际展览仅仅因为国籍。我试图提供背景，从数十年前关于北京城市规划的辩论，到白菜分配的政治史，与我们所看的作品联系起来。某天晚餐时，我翻译了黄笃和韦尔涅的共同愿望：让全球艺术成为艺术交流的舞台，在那里不再有必要以国族身份标示艺术家。

At this point, I broke into the conversation to argue for the importance of cultural specificity in the midst of this hopeful vision. I reminded them of the years of training in Chinese language, history, and culture that had come into play as I interpreted the ground that helped them place various artworks into curatorial discourses of globalization, appropriation, or modernity, to draw attention to the complex processes underlying this translation effort of fitting "original" intentions together with their complements. In the equation of Chinese X = English Y, the trick of the equal sign (the more forgettable, the job better done) makes the passage to formal synonymy seem smooth and transparent when it also contains histories of inequality. What, for example, the director of the Walker Art Center and the director of the World Art Museum at Beijing's Millennium Monument might mean by reference to "global art/shijie yishu" emerges from specific, nonequivalent understandings about the role of art in the global system and its modern nation-state components. While there may be an "international language of art" that crosses national borders, those who speak it do so from different subject positions and fields of reference, some of which have more canonical power in the world than others.[12]

The Language of Art/Yishu

“art ／艺术”的语言

In her analysis of literature, national culture, and translated modernity in semicolonial China, Lydia Liu challenges conventional understandings of translation with her concept of translingual practice. This practice, which she traces through neologisms introduced into Chinese from Japanese and European languages, accounts for the meaningful alterations that occur when words travel through time and cultural-linguistic space. As Liu explains, she “examines the process by which new words, new meanings, discourses, and modes of representation arise, circulate, and acquire legitimacy within the host language due to, or in spite of, the latter’s contact/collision with the guest language.”[13] For example, the contemporary Chinese term for “art” (yishu) is as a return graphic loan. The two pictographs for yi and shu once formed a classical Chinese-character compound that signified the broad range of skills—in social rites, music, archery, chariotry, literature, and mathematics—Confucian scholars were expected to master. The character compound was then borrowed by the Japanese to translate the modern European meaning of “art” and then reintroduced through Japan into modern Chinese.[14] I translated “art” as yishu as if they were interchangeable, yet a long history of travel, profound anxiety about the future of Asia in the world, and Western and Japanese colonial incursions preceded my ability to do so. Related twentieth-century ideological building blocks include wenhua/culture (return graphic loan), xiandai/modern (Sino-Japanese-European loanword), and bowuguan/museum (neologism derived from missionary-Chinese texts).

刘禾在分析半殖民地中国的文学、民族文化与翻译现代性时，以“跨语际实践”概念挑战对翻译的常规理解。这一实践——她通过从日语和欧洲语言引入汉语的新词加以追踪——解释了词语穿越时间和文化语言空间时发生的有意义变化。如刘禾所解释，她“考察新词、新意义、话语和再现方式如何由于宿主语言与宾客语言的接触／碰撞，或尽管存在这种接触／碰撞，仍在宿主语言中产生、流通并获得合法性”。[13] 例如，当代汉语中的“艺术”一词是一个回流的书写借词。“艺”和“术”两个字曾构成一个古汉语复合词，指儒家学者应掌握的广泛技能——礼、乐、射、御、书、数。该复合词随后被日语借用，用以翻译欧洲现代意义上的“art”，再经由日本重新引入现代汉语。[14] 我把“art”译为“艺术”，仿佛二者可以互换，然而在这一能力形成之前，已经存在漫长的旅行史、对亚洲在世界中未来的深切焦虑，以及西方和日本的殖民入侵。相关的二十世纪意识形态基石还包括文化／culture（回流的书写借词）、现代／modern（汉日欧借词）和博物馆／museum（源自传教士中文文本的新造词）。

In the period of Liu's analysis of Chinese literature, 1900–37, Chinese writers participated in a multitude of translingual practices because of the conditions of imperialism. In order to resist, they turned to words and ideas borrowed from the West, often via Japan as the major interpreter of Western modernity for China. They relentlessly translated European texts into Chinese, carving a largely one-way channel. Liu asks of this passionate, sometimes desperate engagement, "Is there a difference between colonization and self-colonization? If so, what does the difference tell us about the meaning of agency?"[15] She also argues that while Chinese more often serves as host language to a Western guest (curators in the case at hand) than the other way around, it is nonetheless a host that does not simply receive, but changes the guest language through approximate translation and insertion into Chinese texts and contexts. A long history of cultural encounter has shaped this biculturality, linguistic copresence of East and West, or coauthorship performed through everyday language use.

在刘禾所分析的中国文学时期，即 1900 至 1937 年，中国作家因帝国主义处境而参与了大量跨语际实践。为了抵抗，他们转向从西方借来的词语和观念，且往往经由作为西方现代性主要阐释者的日本。他们不懈地把欧洲文本译成中文，开辟出一条基本单向的渠道。刘禾对这一热切、有时绝望的投入问道："殖民与自我殖民之间是否存在差异？如果存在，这一差异告诉我们能动性的意义是什么？"[15] 她还论证，虽然中文更经常充当西方宾客的宿主语言（就本案例而言，宾客是策展人），而不是相反，但这个宿主并不只是接收，而是通过近似翻译和嵌入中文文本与语境来改变宾客语言。漫长的文化相遇史塑造了这种双文化性、东西方的语言共存，或通过日常语言使用完成的共同书写。

Liu's analysis of Goethe's term Weltliteratur (world literature), coined in 1827 and taken up by early twentieth-century writers in China, presents the Chinese problematic in a way that remains insightful for discussions of "global art." She cites a passage from Goethe in which the term first appears: "He who understands and studies the German language finds himself on the market where all nations offer their merchandise, he plays the interpreter in proportion as he enriches himself. And thus every translator should be considered a mediator striving to promote this universal spiritual exchange and taking it upon himself to make this generalized trade go forward. For whatever may be said of the inadequacy of translation, it remains one of the most essential and most worthy activities in the general traffic of the world (italics added by Liu)."[16] In her discussion of the Chinese translation, shijie wenxue (world literature), Liu describes its burden of justifying China's seat at the table of a modern international community: "As it happens, Chinese writers do not share the optimistic outlook that characterizes Goethe's confidence about the German language and literature. Unlike the latter, who saw himself presiding over a world market wherein all nations offer their merchandise to him while he plays the translator magnanimously as he enriches himself, May Fourth writers turn to European literature largely with the intention of learning how to produce a national canon worthy of being accepted by world literature and being valued by the West."[17] As ethnographer-interpreter, I examine the complex intentionalities embodied in the objects that pass through art institutions and the translingual practices that frame them. To speak of dangdai yishu/contemporary art under the weight of proving China's current place in the world is also to insist on cultural specificity alongside appeals for artistic universality.

刘禾对歌德 1827 年创造、后被二十世纪初中国作家采用的 "Weltliteratur"（世界文学）一词的分析，以至今仍具洞察力的方式呈现了中国问题。她引用歌德首次使用该词的段落："懂得并研究德语的

人，身处所有民族陈列其商品的市场；他越使自己富有，就越扮演翻译者的角色。因此，每一位译者都应被视为一位中介者，努力促进这种普遍的精神交流，并承担推动这场普遍贸易前行的责任。因为无论人们如何谈论翻译的不足，它仍然是世界普遍交往中最根本、最值得从事的活动之一（斜体为刘禾所加）。”[16] 在讨论中文译词“世界文学”时，刘禾描述了它证明中国在现代国际社会席位的负担：“恰巧，中国作家并不共享歌德对德国语言和文学的乐观信心。歌德看到自己主持一个世界市场，所有民族向他陈列商品，而他慷慨地扮演译者、充实自身；与此不同，五四作家转向欧洲文学，很大程度上是想学习如何生产一种配得上被世界文学接受、被西方珍视的民族经典。”[17] 作为民族志学者兼口译员，我考察穿过艺术机构的物品所承载的复杂意图性，以及框定它们的跨语际实践。在证明中国当前世界地位的重负下谈论“当代艺术”，也意味着在呼吁艺术普遍性的同时坚持文化特殊性。

My second stint as interpreter occurred seven months later, when three curators from the Yerba Buena Center for the Arts (ybca) in San Francisco arrived in Beijing. They had shared notes and ideas with Philippe Vergne as part of their preparation and contacted Huang Du, who again served as a local guide. This time I actively prearranged my role in their visit, with everyone's understanding that it would be part of my fieldwork. When the visiting curators asked me beforehand for input on artists who fell outside the usual circuit, I mentioned the privileging of a largely male avant-garde. At their request, I made arrangements for them to meet with several female artists. In Beijing, René de Guzman, Doryun Chong, and Eungie Joo began a multicity tour of the region that also included Chengdu, Tokyo, Osaka, and Taipei. This trip constituted first-stage research for an exhibition to feature emerging or mid-career Asian artists in China, Japan, Korea, and Taiwan. They later decided to include artists from Thailand as the exhibit took shape under the title Time After Time: Asia and Our Moment (2003). They conceptualized it as an Asian cities show connecting Asia to the location of the museum they represented, the Pacific Rim city of San Francisco with its history of Asian immigration.

我第二次担任口译是在七个月后，旧金山耶尔巴布埃纳艺术中心（YBCA）的三位策展人来到北京。他们与菲利普·韦尔涅交换了笔记和想法，作为准备工作的一部分，并联系了再次担任当地向导的黄笃。这一次，我主动预先安排了自己在访问中的角色，所有人都理解这将成为我田野工作的一部分。当来访策展人事先问我哪些艺术家处在通常圈子之外时，我提到先锋艺术在很大程度上偏重男性。应他们要求，我安排他们会见几位女性艺术家。在北京，勒内·德古兹曼、Doryun Chong 和 Eungie Joo 开始了一次多城市区域之行，还包括成都、东京、大阪和台北。此行是为一个展出中国、日本、韩国和台湾新兴或中生代亚洲艺术家作品的展览做第一阶段研究。随着展览以《一次又一次：亚洲与我们此刻》（2003）为题成形，他们后来决定加入泰国艺术家。他们把它构想为一个亚洲城市展，将亚洲与他们所代表博物馆所在地——太平洋沿岸的旧金山及其亚洲移民史——联系起来。

As Visual Arts Curator of the ybca, René de Guzman had hired Doryun Chong and Eungie Joo as collaborating consultants on the project. He later mentioned that differentiating between their individual interests as curators would "add to the poignancy of what is invariably lost in translation," noting that his curatorial concerns were largely defined by the goals of the ybca as an institution: "The project for me signifies an attempt at defining an international program that grows out of geo-centric motives."[18] With a doctoral degree in Ethnic Studies, Eungie Joo brought to the conversation a commitment to increasing the visibility of U.S. artists of color and challenging institutional rubrics that limit understanding of their work. Doryun Chong's involvement in the exhibit planning emerged from his training as an art historian of contemporary art in East Asia.

作为 YBCA 视觉艺术策展人，勒内·德古兹曼聘请 Doryun Chong 和 Eungie Joo 担任项目合作顾问。他后来说，区分他们各自作为策展人的兴趣，会“加剧翻译中必然失落之物的辛酸”，并指出他的策展关切主要由 YBCA 作为机构的目标界定：“这个项目对我而言，象征着一次尝试：定义一个从地缘中心动机生长出来的国际项目。”[18] 拥有族裔研究博士学位的 Eungie Joo 为对话带来一种承诺：提高美国有色人种艺术家的可见度，并挑战限制人们理解其作品的机构准则。Doryun Chong 参与展览策划，源自他作为东亚当代艺术史学者的训练。

On their first night in Beijing, we met in their hotel bar, where de Guzman gave Huang Du and me some background to the ybca and its goals of serving a city that "has been the primary gateway for infusing Asian peoples into the fabric of America and this region."[19] As part of this introduction he mentioned that the San Francisco "South of Market" urban renewal project, where the larger Yerba Buena Center is located, had previously displaced several minority and immigrant communities. I later gained a fuller picture of this project, originally envisioned after World War II as a large-scale commercial convention-sports-office complex that would secure San Francisco's international importance. Over the years, city business leaders, corporate councils, and elected officials pushed to have the "South of Market" area declared blighted, appropriated from its current residents, and bulldozed to make way for their redevelopment scheme. Decades of neighborhood and union protest, legal wrangling, and political conflict stalled this land-grab until the late 1970s when construction began.[20] The displaced population included migratory workingmen, dockworkers, warehouse and factory workers, and immigrants—African Americans from the South, Germans, Irish, Greeks, Japanese, and Filipinos.[21] At the beginning of the twenty-first century, the ybca as a public museum in the center of the redeveloped area was charged with a new mandate to culturally connect the city back to these previously displaced communities.

他们抵达北京的第一晚，我们在酒店酒吧见面，德古兹曼向黄笃和我介绍 YBCA 的背景及其目标——服务一座“一直是把亚洲各民族注入美国及本地区肌理的主要门户”的城市。[19] 作为介绍的一部分，他提到旧金山“市场街南”（South of Market）城市更新项目曾迁置若干少数族裔和移民社区，而更大的耶尔巴布埃纳中心就坐落于此。我后来更全面地了解该项目：它最初在二战后被构想为一个大型商业会议—体育—办公综合体，以确保旧金山的国际重要性。多年来，城市商界领袖、企业委员会和民选官员推动把“市场街南”地区宣布为破败区，从其现有居民手中征用，并用推土机夷平，为他们的再开发计划让路。数十年的社区与工会抗议、法律纠纷和政治冲突拖延了这场土地掠夺，直到 1970 年代末建设才开始。[20] 被迁置人口包括流动工人、码头工人、仓库和工厂工人，以及移民——来自南方的非裔美国人、德国人、爱尔兰人、希腊人、日本人和菲律宾人。[21] 二十一世纪初，作为再开发区域中心公共博物馆的 YBCA，负有一项新使命：在文化上重新建

立这座城市与这些先前被迁置社区的联系。

The ybca curators, like Philippe Vergne, came to China informed by particular institutional motivations that arose, in their case, from San Francisco's history of striving to become a global city. Its story of dispossession and then attempt at redress presents a picture of complicity between culture and commerce similar to that of "New Beijing." The curators also informally discussed their personal links to Asia as an additional rationale for their involvement in the exhibition project. René de Guzman and Eungie Joo are second-generation Filipino and Korean Americans, respectively; and Doryun Chong left South Korea in his late teens to pursue higher education in the United States. They narrated abbreviated life histories of immigration and experience as ethnic Americans, as did I, emphasizing a difference in their art world position as Asian American interlocutors.

像菲利普·韦尔涅一样，YBCA 策展人来到中国时，带着特定的机构动机——就他们而言，这些动机源自旧金山努力成为全球城市的历史。它剥夺然后试图补偿的故事，呈现出文化与商业共谋的图景，与“新北京”相似。策展人们还非正式地谈到自己与亚洲的个人联系，作为参与展览项目的额外理由。勒内·德古兹曼和 Eungie Joo 分别是第二代菲律宾裔和韩裔美国人；Doryun Chong 在青少年晚期离开韩国，赴美接受高等教育。他们讲述简略的移民和族裔美国人生活史，我也一样，强调他们作为亚裔美国对话者在艺术界位置上的差异。

This intersection of institutional and personal stakes informed the conversations that unfolded during the ybca curators' visit to Beijing. Persistent themes in these conversations included the struggle for artistic recognition and representation, the role of the nation-state in these struggles, and ambivalence on the part of artists and curators about national identifications. On the one hand, artists may not see themselves and their work as aligned with national ideology. On the other hand, the notions of artist as soldier and artist as dissident are both structured by a modern system of nation-state governance, as are the art institutions that produce artists, curators, and exhibitions.

机构利益与个人利害的交汇，影响了 YBCA 策展人访问北京期间的对话。这些对话中反复出现的主题包括争取艺术承认与再现的斗争、民族国家在这些斗争中的角色，以及艺术家和策展人对国族认同的矛盾心理。一方面，艺术家可能不认为自己及作品与民族意识形态一致。另一方面，“艺术家作为战士”和“艺术家作为异见者”的观念，都由现代民族国家治理体系所结构，生产艺术家、策展人和展览的艺术机构也是如此。

On their first day of studio tours, Huang Du accommodated multiple demands on his schedule by bringing along another visiting curator. Ute Meta Bauer, a professor at the Institute for Contemporary Art at the Akademie der Bildenden Künste in Vienna, was in town through programming arrangements made by the Beijing branch of the German Goethe Institut. On the previous evening, many Chinese artists I knew had attended the lecture she gave at the institute about her role as cocurator in Documenta 11. The Documenta exhibitions, presented once every five years in Kassel, Germany, since 1955, serve as surveys of international contemporary art, each distinguished by the programmatic vision of the curator selected to direct the show. Okwui Enwezor, Nigerian by birth, headed Documenta 11 as the first non-Western curator to hold the directorship, and in an unprecedented move, he selected six cocurators to help orchestrate an expanded exhibition concept, consisting of five platforms to take place between March 2001 and September 2002 in locations including Vienna, Berlin, New Delhi, St. Lucia, Lagos, and Kassel.[22] From what I later heard about Bauer's talk, many in the audience had pressed her for information about what the curatorial team sought in submissions and whether Chinese work would be represented. The Goethe Institut, whose mission is to promote German language and culture overseas, as the venue for this conversation provides a reminder of the ongoing history of culture and power.

在他们参观工作室的第一天，黄笃为了兼顾日程上的多项要求，还带上了另一位来访策展人。乌特·梅塔·鲍尔是维也纳美术学院当代艺术研究所教授，因德国歌德学院北京分院安排的项目而来到北京。前一天晚上，我认识的许多中国艺术家参加了她在学院所作的讲座，谈她作为第十一届卡塞尔文献展联合策展人的角色。文献展自 1955 年以来每五年在德国卡塞尔举办一次，是对国际当代艺术的概览，每届都因被选为总监的策展人的纲领性愿景而独具特色。出生于尼日利亚的奥奎·恩维佐担任第十一届文献展总监，是首位担任该职的非西方策展人；他以前所未有的举动选出六位联合策展人，协助编排一个扩展的展览概念，由五个平台组成，于 2001 年 3 月至 2002 年 9 月间在维也纳、柏林、新德里、圣卢西亚、拉各斯和卡塞尔等地举行。[22] 从后来听到的关于鲍尔讲座的情况看，许多听众追问策展团队在投稿中寻找什么，以及中国作品是否会被代表。歌德学院的使命是在海外推广德国语言和文化，而它作为这场对话的场所，提醒人们文化与权力的历史仍在继续。

Huang Du took us that morning to the apartment studio of Hong Hao, who four and half years earlier had perpetrated an elaborate art hoax as a challenge to the Euro-American centrism of international art and Chinese desire to be recognized by it. In May 1997, he and fellow artist Yan Lei sent out fake Documenta 10 letters, typed in German on letterhead they had meticulously reproduced by silk-screen print, inviting artists across China to participate in a special show called From the Other World—Chinese Avant-garde (Aus der anderen Welt—chinesische Avantgarde). The letter, which was signed Ielnay Oahgnoh (the two artists' names in pinyin spelled backwards), gave a local contact number to call for more information. When artists rushed to call it, they discovered it connected them to a public telephone booth. The anger of those fooled by the invitations reached such a level that Hong and Yan issued an apology letter in the Jiangsu Pictorial art journal. Their prank letter made obvious the host-guest power dynamics at work in the translation of Chinese contemporary art into the "world market" of art. The title of their fake exhibit plays on a Western framing of China as part of a distant, foreign world, not yet coeval with the one into which they send their art. The letter's signature, a neologistic pun contrived of names spelled backwards, imitates the authorial aura of the foreign word, even if incomprehensible, within a Chinese context. In Hong Hao's cramped apartment, Bauer handed him a business card. (Huang had briefed her before the meeting about Hong's history as fake Documenta representative.) Grasping her card in both hands as a gesture of respect, Hong impishly stated that it would now be easier for him to duplicate the logo and start issuing his own Documenta business cards.

那天上午，黄笃带我们去了洪浩的公寓工作室。四年半前，洪浩策划了一场精心设计的艺术骗局，挑战国际艺术的欧美中心主义，以及中国渴望被其承认的心态。1997 年 5 月，他和艺术家颜磊寄出伪造的第十届文献展邀请函，用他们精心丝网印刷复制的信笺纸以德文打字，邀请全中国艺术家参加一个名为《来自另一个世界——中国先锋艺术》（Aus der anderen Welt—chinesische Avantgarde）的特别展览。信末署名 Ielnay Oahgnoh（两位艺术家名字的拼音倒序拼写），并留下一个本地联系电话供咨询。艺术家们急忙打过去，发现那连接到一个公用电话亭。受骗者的愤怒达到如此程度，以致洪浩和颜磊在《江苏画刊》上发表道歉信。他们的恶作剧信件揭示了把中国当代艺术翻译进艺术“世界市场”时的主客权力动态。假展览的标题戏耍了西方把中国框定为遥远、陌生世界的一部分——尚未与他们送艺术进入的世界同时代。信件署名是以姓名倒拼构成的新造双关，模仿外文词在中国语境中的作者光晕，即便它不可理解。在洪浩局促的公寓里，鲍尔递给他一张名片。（黄笃此前已向鲍尔简要介绍过洪浩假冒文献展代表的经历。）洪浩双手接过名片以示尊重，却顽皮地说，现在他复制标志、开始印发自己的文献展名片会更容易。

In the afternoon, the curators headed for the second-floor cafe of Beijing's Sanlian Bookstore, where the editors of Du shu (Reading), a well-known journal of culture and politics, had organized a roundtable discussion with Ute Meta Bauer and local artists and art scholars.[23] Daisy Yiyou Wang, a Chinese-born art historian who at the time was pursuing a PhD at Ohio University, served as the Chinese-English interpreter. Bauer began by giving a brief history of Documenta. After World War II, at a time when many German artists had emigrated or been killed, Arnold Bode, a painter and professor from Kassel, hoped to reestablish Germany's place as a participant in world cultural discourse and international art developments. In 1955, he organized a retrospective of twentieth-century art and presented work that the Nazis had declared degenerate, including artists such as Picasso, Ernst, Arp, Matisse, Kandinsky, and Moore. This vision of cultural exchange on the global level focused, in the first ten exhibits, mainly on Europe and North America. The selection of Enwezor to direct the eleventh exhibition in 2001–2 placed high expectations on his ability to globalize the event.

下午，策展人们前往北京三联书店二层的咖啡馆，著名文化与政治杂志《读书》的编辑在那里组织了一场与乌特·梅塔·鲍尔及本地艺术家、艺术学者的圆桌讨论。[23] 出生于中国的艺术史学者王伊悠（Daisy Yiyou Wang）当时正在俄亥俄大学攻读博士，担任中英口译。鲍尔首先简要介绍文献展历史。二战后，许多德国艺术家或流亡或遇害，来自卡塞尔的画家、教授阿诺德·博德希望重新确立德国作为世界文化话语和国际艺术发展参与者的地位。1955 年，他组织了一场二十世纪艺术回顾展，展出被纳粹宣布为“堕落”的作品，包括毕加索、恩斯特、阿尔普、马蒂斯、康定斯基和摩尔等艺术家。这种全球层面文化交流的愿景，在前十届展览中主要聚焦欧洲和北美。选择恩维佐执导 2001 至 2002 年的第十一届展览，使人们高度期待他能让这一活动全球化。

The Du shu roundtable conversation gradually turned to the difficulty of organizing shows that claim to be global in reach, since an immediate impulse usually arises to demonstrate adequate representation from all "significant" geographic regions; and artists then begin to suspect curators of basing their selections more on where artists live than on their work. Bauer explained that she had frequently run into this dilemma, for example, at her talk the night before, when she fielded questions about whether or not Documenta 11 would include Latin American or Asian artists. She responded that this identification by geographic lumping doesn't seem important to most artists, who don't want to act as national representatives. Philippe Vergne would express a similar sentiment several months later, in March 2002, during a roundtable organized for the opening of the Walker's How Latitudes Become Forms exhibit:

《读书》圆桌讨论逐渐转向组织号称具有全球覆盖面的展览之困难，因为人们通常立刻想展示所有"重要"地理区域都有充分代表；艺术家随后便开始怀疑策展人的选择更多基于艺术家居住地，而非作品。鲍尔解释说，她经常遇到这一困境，例如前一天晚上的讲座中，有人问她第十一届文献展是否会包括拉丁美洲或亚洲艺术家。她回答说，这种按地理归类的身份认定对大多数艺术家似乎并不重要，他们不想充当国家代表。几个月后，2002 年 3 月，菲利普·韦尔涅在为沃克中心《纬度如何成为形式》展览开幕组织的圆桌讨论中表达了类似感受：

> What does it mean when you enter a studio in Johannesburg or in São Paulo or in Beijing and say, "I'm here because I'm doing a global show and you're a global artist"?... Should we conceive of the show as a global show, or should we find a theme around globalization, or should we talk about something else? Is the show about art and practices? I also have the feeling when entering the studios that artists really want to be included in exhibitions about something else. They don't want to be in a global show.[24]

> 当你走进约翰内斯堡、圣保罗或北京的一间工作室，说："我来这里是因为我在做一个全球展，而你是一位全球艺术家"，这意味着什么？……我们应该把展览设想为一个全球展，还是围绕全球化寻找一个主题，还是谈论点别的？展览是关于艺术与实践的吗？我走进工作室时也有这种感觉：艺术家真正想被纳入的是关于别的东西的展览。他们不想参加一个全球展。[24]

Bauer continued by saying she sometimes wished, as a curator, that artists would say no more often if they felt a national or any other ideological framework being imposed on them.

鲍尔接着说，作为策展人，她有时希望，如果艺术家感到民族或其他意识形态框架被强加于己，他们能更经常地说"不"。

Eungie Joo then broke into the discussion to say that for artists marginalized by art world politics, where the odds are already stacked against them, it's hard to say no. They don't know when they might get another chance and feel compelled to take whatever they get, even if it's not ideal.[25] She also brought up another potential danger for the global ambitions of the Enwezor-directed Documenta 11 by comparing its possible long-term impact to the backlash that occurred after the 1993 Whitney Biennial in New York, labeled by critics as the “politically correct” biennial. Curator Elisabeth Sussman selected artwork that she felt would reach groups not usually drawn to the museum and that reflected debates about multiculturalism, particularly its critiques of mainstream representation and institutional framing. An unprecedented number of artists of color as well as female and gay and lesbian artists exhibited work. Pieces included in the show took on political issues, ranging from the aids crisis to police violence against Rodney King. Attacks against the show, calling it didactic moralizing, lacking in aesthetic and formal value, and even “worthless junk,” came from within and without the art establishment, including a broadside by 60 Minutes.[26] Joo characterized this biennial as an antidote used to counteract previous institutional denial on the part of the Whitney, but in a tokenistic way that enabled critics to characterize “minority art” as “bad art.” Once it was all said and done, guilt had been expunged; a commitment to racial or gender justice could be checked off and forgotten; and artists marginalized by the U.S. art mainstream stood in no better position than before. Bauer replied that opportunities to get a foot in the door and gain symbolic capital must be embraced as one way of trying to wedge to door open wider.

Eungie Joo 随后插话：对于被艺术界政治边缘化的艺术家而言，胜算本就对他们不利，说“不”很难。他们不知道下一次机会何时到来，感到只能接受所能得到的一切，即便并不理想。[25] 她还提出恩维佐执导的第十一届文献展全球抱负面临的另一个潜在危险：她将其可能的长期影响，与 1993 年纽约惠特尼双年展后发生的反弹相比较——批评者当时把该展称为“政治上正确”的双年展。策展人伊丽莎白·萨斯曼选出的作品，是她认为能触及通常不被吸引到博物馆的群体、并反映多元文化主义辩论——尤其是对主流再现和机构框定的批评——的作品。参展的有色人种艺术家以及女性、男同性恋和女同性恋艺术家人数前所未有。展品处理从艾滋病危机到警察对罗德尼·金的暴力等政治议题。对展览的攻击——称其说教、缺乏审美和形式价值，甚至“毫无价值的垃圾”——来自艺术界内外，包括《60 分钟》的猛烈抨击。[26] Joo 把这场双年展描述为一剂解药，用来抵消惠特尼此前的机构性否认，却以一种象征性点缀的方式，使批评者得以把“少数族裔艺术”定性为“坏艺术”。一切尘埃落定后，负罪感被消除；对种族或性别正义的承诺可以打勾然后遗忘；被美国艺术主流边缘化的艺术家处境并不比从前更好。鲍尔回答说，必须抓住踏进门、获得象征资本的机会，作为把门撬得更宽的一种方式。

I drew in my notes a schematic of the three discourses that came into conflict in the conversation that afternoon (figure 3.02). While interrelated, these discourses also bear the traces of their historical formation, and tensions remain among them. The Documenta position arises from a German historical moment of skepticism with regard to national politics but a simultaneous desire for Germany to regain a position of world prominence by serving as a Weltliteraturlike platform for cross-cultural exchange between nations. The position articulated by Joo through her example of the 1993 Whitney Biennial presents a kind of diversity nationalism, in which marginalized artists in the United States seek to expand the definition of American cultural citizenship, and thereby make visible the imperialist links between the United States and other parts of the world. The significance of China’s positioning below Europe and the United States hinges on Chinese artists’ ready acknowledgement that no exhibits in China garnered the international attention that Documenta and the Whitney Biennial did. Their desire to emerge on the global stage as a culture capable of commanding the world’s attention represented a conflicted nationalism, of which they were sometimes deeply critical, but that was sustained nonetheless by an art system structured by national institutions.

我在笔记上画了那天下午对话中相互冲突的三种话语的示意图（图 3.02）。这三种话语虽然相互关联，却也带有各自历史形成的痕迹，彼此之间的紧张持续存在。文献展立场源于德国的一个历史时刻：对国家政治持怀疑态度，同时渴望德国通过充当类似世界文学的国与国跨文化交流平台，重新

Yan Lei, Hong Hao's collaborator in the Documenta 10 letter hoax, created that same year a piece titled Are You Among Those Invited to the German Exhibition? (plate 9). This painting features a Chinese fencer ready to begin a match: one hand poised to pull down a face mask, the other brandishing a sword. An arc of red flags cuts a dramatic diagonal against the blue sky behind her. The symbol repeated on the flag, a lower case "d" with an "x" superimposed over it, is the logo for Documenta 10. At the top, Yan painted the title question in Chinese characters and pinyin, in a style reminiscent of socialist propaganda posters. He conflates the competition of Chinese artists for invitations to international art exhibits with the desire to compete for one's country in the Olympic Games. His choice of a female fencer to represent the nation also references the "iron girl" attitude of socialist gender formations, a striking contrast with the overwhelmingly male representation in Chinese contemporary art worlds and a reminder of the gender politics also at play in determining who is among those invited.[27] Although the ybca curators had requested that I make arrangements for them to meet with several female artists in Beijing, Huang Du disagreed with my recommendations and convinced them not to waste their time on these meetings. After the first one, the ybca curators collectively agreed and asked me to cancel the rest. In his research on professionalization of the arts in post-Mao China, Richard Kraus observes that this process did not as a matter of course lead to liberalization or greater equality. Rather the building of shared structures created exclusionary practices. He cites as example the statistics for Writers Association membership, which show a sharp decline between 1981 and 1988 in the number of women and ethnic minority members, with the male-to-female ratio increasing by a factor of almost seven.[28]

颜磊——洪浩在文献展邀请函骗局中的合作者——同年创作了《你在被邀请参加德国展览的人当中吗?》（图版 9）。这幅画描绘一名准备开始比赛的中国击剑手：一只手准备拉下面罩，另一只手挥舞长剑。一道红旗弧线在蔚蓝天空背景下划出戏剧性对角线。旗帜上重复的符号——一个上面叠加 “x” 的小写 “d”——是第十届文献展的标志。颜磊在画面上方用汉字和拼音写出标题中的问题，风格令人想起社会主义宣传画。他把中国艺术家争取国际艺术展邀请的竞争，与代表国家参加奥运会的渴望混为一谈。他选择女击剑手代表国家，也指涉社会主义性别塑造中的 “ 铁姑娘 ” 姿态，这与中国当代艺术界压倒性的男性代表形成鲜明对比，也提醒人们注意决定谁在受邀者之列的性别政治。[27] 尽管 YBCA 策展人曾要求我安排他们见几位北京的女性艺术家，黄笃却不赞同我的推荐，并说服他们不要把时间浪费在这些会面上。第一次会面之后，YBCA 策展人一致同意，让我取消其余安排。理查德 • 克劳斯在研究毛泽东之后中国的艺术专业化时观察到，这一过程并未自然带来自由化或更大平等。相反，共同结构的建设制造了排他性实践。他举作家协会会员统计为例：1981 至 1988 年间，女性和少数民族会员人数急剧下降，男女比例几乎增至原来的七倍。[28]

On November 30, 2001, the ybca curators’ second full day of meeting artists, we drove east of the city center toward the mixed rural-urban Tongzhou District. After three studio visits in the morning, we stopped for lunch at a new two-story restaurant on the side of a dusty road. Around our table sat the three ybca curators, Huang Du, Wang Yin, two other artists from the morning’s agenda, the driver of our car, and myself. I sat stuffing steamed dumplings into my mouth, enjoying a reprieve from my role as interpreter. The beginnings of a lively debate about exactly what I momentarily hoped to escape grumbled in our smoke-filled banquet room. In discussing the unequal parameters of the international art world, in which Chinese artists gained success by inclusion in exhibits in the West but not the other way around, the Chinese artists launched into a complaint about the dominance of English. They described how they often feel misinterpreted or misunderstood when participating in international exhibits but cannot express themselves well enough in English to enter into meaningful conversation.

2001 年 11 月 30 日，YBCA 策展人用一整天会见艺术家的第二天，我们驱车前往市中心以东城乡交错的通州区。上午走访三个工作室后，我们在一条尘土飞扬的路边一座新开的两层餐馆停下吃午饭。桌边坐着三位 YBCA 策展人、黄笃、王音、上午日程中的另外两位艺术家、我们的司机和我。我坐着把蒸饺塞进嘴里，享受摆脱口译角色的一刻。一场关于我此刻希望逃离之事的激烈辩论的苗头，在烟雾缭绕的包间里低声酝酿。中国艺术家在讨论国际艺术界不平等的参数——中国艺术家靠参加西方展览取得成功，反过来却不行——时，开始抱怨英语的支配地位。他们描述自己参加国际展览时常常感到被误读或误解，却无法用英语充分表达，以进行有意义的对话。

Eungie Joo agreed that a formidable communication gap presents itself at such events and that they as artists have to make certain demands. Drawing on the conversation with Ute Meta Bauer the day before, she said she understood not having the luxury to "say no," even if the opportunity taken under these conditions might entail inevitable miscommunication, but that they should demand professional interpreters as part of a contractual agreement to participate. She emphasized that contemporary art requires more explanation and contextualization than other forms of art, making adequate translation more imperative than ever. Her foregrounding of a demand to be recognized—to have a voice—is rooted in the U.S. diversity politics strategy of claiming collective injustice in order to lobby for equal representation in the nation and its institutions. But the Chinese artists at the table wanted not just to be included more equally in a U.S. museum but to have the power to produce and interpret contemporary art on their own home ground. For them, more translation does not necessarily change the rules of the game, if the "general traffic of the world" is still directed toward the West.

Eungie Joo 同意这种场合存在巨大的沟通鸿沟，艺术家必须提出某些要求。她借用前一天与乌特·梅塔·鲍尔的对话说，她理解没有“说不”的奢侈，即便在这种情况下抓住的机会可能带来不可避免的误传，但他们应当要求在参展合同中配备专业口译员。她强调，当代艺术需要比其它艺术形式更多的解释和语境化，因此充分的翻译比以往更加迫切。她突出“被承认”的要求——拥有声音——根源在于美国多元性政治的策略：申明群体遭受的不公，以争取在国家及其机构中获得平等代表。但桌边的中国艺术家不仅想更平等地被纳入一家美国博物馆，还想在自己的土地上拥有生产和阐释当代艺术的权力。对他们而言，如果“世界普遍交往”仍以西方为方向，更多翻译未必改变游戏规则。

Joo's use of the phrase "say no" signified having the power to refuse others' framings, an idea that arose repeatedly in the ybca curators' conversations. At our lunch table, I translated "say no" in the most literal word-to-word fashion of shuo bu rather than the more "native" term jujue, meaning "to refuse." Through this choice, I made tongue-in-cheek reference to an anti-U.S. bestseller called China Can Say No.[29] While I did not have time to explain the linguistic genealogy of these two syllables to the curators, the artists at the table recognized it with a knowing laugh. Many Chinese intellectuals critiqued this book as inflammatory nationalist rhetoric, but its mid-1990s popularity represented ambivalence about increased economic and cultural ties between China and the West. The book's cover depicts the Great Wall guarded by a composite figure with the head of the Statue of Liberty affixed to the body of a military police officer. At the top, the copy reads, "China says no, not to seek confrontation, but for a more equal dialogue." This book introduced the translated phrase shuo bu into everyday Chinese lexicon.

Joo 使用“说不”一语，意味着拥有拒绝他人框定的权力，这一观念在 YBCA 策展人的交谈中反复出现。在我们的午餐桌上，我用最字面的逐词方式把 "say no" 译成“说不”，而不是更“地道”的“拒绝”。通过这一选择，我半开玩笑地指涉一本反美畅销书《中国可以说不》。[29] 我虽没有时间向策展人解释这两个音节的语言谱系，桌边的艺术家却会心一笑，认出了它。许多中国知识分子批评这本书是煽动性的民族主义修辞，但它在 1990 年代中期的流行，代表了对中国与西方经济文化联系日益紧密的矛盾心理。书的封面描绘长城，守卫它的是一个合成形象：自由女神像的头颅接在军警的身体上。上方文案写道：“中国说不，不是为了寻求对抗，而是为了更平等的对话。”这本书把译词“说不”引入日常汉语词汇。

It followed a trend of books in Asia about "saying no," beginning with The Japan That Can Say No in 1989. The high sales of this book in Japan received so much attention in the U.S. Congress, where some used it as justification for trade sanctions against Japan, that it was translated into English.[30] The phrase "say no" in Japanese is adopted from English, with the "no" untranslated. By turning around American depictions of Japanese social relations as not transparent enough, especially in business negotiations—insinuating that Japanese needed to learn the American practice of "saying no when you mean no"—Sony chairman Akio Morita and politician Shintaro Ishihara critiqued U.S. business practices and advocated greater Japanese independence. The Japan That Can Say No then led to The Asia That Can Say No, coauthored by Ishihara and the prime minister of Malaysia.[31] The book's title in English, The Voice of Asia: Two Leaders Discuss the Coming Century, toned down its claim to sovereignty and rejection of the West. The translation of "saying no" into Chinese represents what linguists call a Sino-Japanese-English loanword. Uncertainty about where and how cultural and political nationalism overlap, which caused the laughter at my use of the loan word, troubled the artists' response to Joo's insistence on more translators at the table of international art over simply "saying no."

它追随了亚洲“说不”书籍的潮流，始于 1989 年的《日本可以说不》。这本书在日本的畅销在美国国会引起极大关注，有人用它作为对日贸易制裁的理由，于是它被译成英文。[30] 日语中的 "say no" 借自英语，"no" 未加翻译。索尼董事长盛田昭夫和政治家石原慎太郎反过来利用美国对日本社会关系——尤其在商业谈判中——不够透明的描绘（暗示日本人需要学习“想拒绝时就拒绝”的美国做法），批评美国商业实践，主张日本更大的独立性。《日本可以说不》随后催生了石原慎太郎与马来西亚总理合著的《亚洲可以说不》。[31] 该书的英文版标题《亚洲之声：两位领袖纵论即将到来的世纪》淡化了其主权主张和对西方的拒绝。“说不”译入中文，代表语言学家所称的汉日英借词。文化与政治民族主义在何处、如何重叠的不确定性——正是这种不确定性让我使用借词时引来笑声——困扰着艺术家对 Joo 坚持在国际艺术桌上增加口译员、而非仅仅“说不”的回应。

Wang Yin nodded at my summary in Chinese of Joo's comments, but then noted with an exhalation of cigarette smoke and raised eyebrows that things were not so easy. Recruiting his teacup as explanatory tool, he laid out his working metaphor for translation as a process that always exceeds the standard tropes of fidelity or natural equivalency that can be discovered between languages, suggesting that more translation may not solve their dilemma. Pointing to his teacup, Wang described any object of translation as a boat, which—he slid the teacup from one spot on the table to another—crosses a river. When tethered to one shore the boat means something different than when docked on the other shore. Even though the materiality of the teacup/boat remains the same, people view it differently, just as Chinese and Western audiences will inevitably "place" his paintings through different conceptual and experiential frameworks.[32] What the boat means changes because of the journey. He concluded, "It's like Wei Cheng," indicating for me to explain this reference to the 1947 novel by Qian Zhongshu popularized by the 1991 television adaptation. In Wang's invocation of this novel, he reached back to China's semicolonial past. His besieged city is early-2000s Beijing, with its embassy districts and art galleries catering to expatriate clients, where artists at the table with curators from the United States sought international recognition while remaining wary of inevitable misreadings and accusations of selling out.

王音听我用中文概括 Joo 的评论后点了点头，但随后吐出一口烟、扬起眉毛说，事情没那么简单。他借茶杯作解释工具，摆出自己关于翻译的工作隐喻：翻译是一个总会超出惯常的忠实隐喻、或语言之间存在可发现的天然对等这一观念的过程，这意味着更多翻译未必解决他们的困境。王音指着茶杯说，任何翻译对象都像一只船——他把茶杯从桌上一个位置滑到另一个位置——渡过一条河。系在此岸时，船的意义不同于停泊在对岸时。尽管茶杯 / 船的物质性保持不变，人们看待它的方式不同，正如中西方观众不可避免地会通过不同概念和经验框架来 " 放置 " 他的画作。[32] 船的意义因旅程而改变。他最后说：" 这就像《围城》。" 示意我向在场者解释这部钱锺书 1947 年的小说——1991 年电视剧改编使其广为人知。王音援引这部小说，回望中国的半殖民过去。他的围城是 2000 年代初的北京，有使馆区和迎合外籍客户的画廊；艺术家与来自美国的策展人同桌交谈，寻求国际承认，同时警惕不可避免的误读和 " 卖身 " 指控。

The artist at his side further explained, “It’s like the saying about marriage at the beginning of Wei Cheng. Unmarried people want to get married. Married people want to get divorced.” In Wei Cheng, Qian Zhongshu uses marriage as a symbol of kinship or fidelity doomed to failure. His female characters embody in turn moribund tradition; whorish, superficial treaty-port culture; and corrupt, materialistic class-based society. The protagonist Fang Hongjian is the bewildered, satirized, individual hero who bounces between them, with the novel’s women in the supporting roles of representing China in all its possible failed incarnations. The gendered logic underlying this extended metaphor is that contemporary (male) artists identify with the protagonist of Wei Cheng.

他身旁的艺术家进一步解释：“就像《围城》开头关于婚姻的那句话。没结婚的人想结婚。结了婚的人想离婚。”在《围城》中，钱锺书用婚姻象征注定失败的亲缘或忠诚。他的女性人物依次化身垂死的传统；娼妓式的、肤浅的通商口岸文化；以及腐败、物质至上的阶级社会。主人公方鸿渐是在她们之间弹跳的困惑、被讽刺的个体英雄，而小说中的女性则承担配角角色，代表中国种种可能失败的化身。这一延伸隐喻底层的性别逻辑是：当代（男性）艺术家认同《围城》的主人公。

In our banquet room, someone returned to the teacup, stating that if it represented Chinese artwork in international circulation, then Huang Du was the boatman. Huang protested this comparison of him to a middleman, as if it might reduce him to the pidgin of treaty-port compradors like Jimmy Chang in Wei Cheng, who sprinkles his speech with foreign words. When asked, for example, if he collects porcelain, Jimmy responds: “Sure! Have a look-see.... Sure! Worth quite a lot of money, plenty of dough. Besides, these things aren’t like calligraphy or paintings. If you can buy calligraphy or paintings which turn out to be fakes, they aren’t worth a cent. They just amount to wastepaper. If the porcelain is fake, at least it can hold food” (italics are in English in the original).[33] For Huang Du, the cultural capital of his cosmopolitan profession resided in the vocabulary of foreign theory: discourse, hybridity, performativity.

在我们的包间里，有人回到茶杯，说如果它代表国际流通中的中国艺术品，那么黄笃就是船夫。黄笃抗议把他比作中间人，仿佛这会把他贬低为《围城》里吉米·张那种通商口岸买办的洋泾浜语——说话时点缀外文词。例如，有人问吉米是否收集瓷器，他回答：“Sure! Have a look-see…Sure!（当然！去看一看……当然！）值不少钱，plenty of dough（大把钞票）。再说，这些东西不像书法或画。你要是买了书法或画，结果是假的，一文不值，就是 wastepaper（废纸）。瓷器是假的，至少还能盛东西。”（斜体部分在中文原作中即为英文；括号内为本译稿所附释义）[33] 对黄笃而言，他世界性职业的文化资本存在于外国理论的词汇中：话语、杂糅、述行性。

After so much talk of metaphorical boats and movement of porcelain across the table, Joo asserted that as Asian American curators, she and her colleagues represented a new West, intent on resisting the orientalism she felt their comments suggested. Pointing at her face, she said, “The West looks like this now too.” The Chinese artists did not respond; this suggestion of racial alliance or minority cosmopolitanism did not bridge the gap for them. Doryun Chong, the one curator born and educated in Asia before attending university in the United States, interjected to express hesitancy over the idea of being somehow more authentic culture brokers: “In the United States, I’m called upon as a native expert of Korea or Asia. In Korea, I’m granted certain respect or privilege because of my education in the United States. Can I really exploit both situations and stay honest with myself?”

谈了这么多关于隐喻之船和瓷器在桌上移动的话之后，Joo 断言，作为亚裔美国策展人，她和同事代表一个新的西方，决心抵抗她感到他们评论中暗示的东方主义。她指着自己的脸说：“ 西方现在也长这样。” 中国艺术家没有回应；这种种族联盟或少数者世界主义的提议，并未为他们弥合鸿沟。Doryun Chong 是唯一在亚洲出生并接受教育、后赴美读大学的策展人，他插话说，对成为某种更本真的文化中介的想法感到迟疑：“ 在美国，我被当作韩国或亚洲的本土专家；在韩国，我又因为在美受教育而获得某种尊重或特权。我真的能同时利用这两种处境，又对自己保持诚实吗？”

All of the arts professionals present at lunch that day were bicultural in their own right. In everyday experience they drew on cultural vocabularies of both Asia and the West and could do so with relative ease. As a group, they arguably had more in common with each other—the global culture of contemporary art and access to its cosmopolitan resources—than with most citizens of their respective nations.[34] They were all invested in thinking outside the ideological categories of the nation-state. The artists often felt at odds with the Chinese state and its vacillating policies of censorship and sponsorship. The Asian American curators struggled against U.S. institutions of citizenship and national identity framing them as the “unassimilable alien” and worked to create sites of cultural production that remind the nation of its historical ties with Asia in economics, labor, and war.[35] Yet the different discourses of cultural nationalism that informed their participation in global art led to a subtle polarization over the course of the conversation so that the two sides seemed more in tension than sympathy.

那天午餐时在场的所有艺术专业人士本身都是双文化的。在日常经验中，他们调用亚洲和西方的文化词汇，并能相对自如地这样做。作为一个群体，他们彼此之间的共同点——当代艺术的全球文化及其世界主义资源的可及性——可以说多于与各自国家大多数公民的共同点。[34] 他们都投身于超越民族国家意识形态范畴的思考。艺术家常感到与中国国家及其摇摆不定的审查与赞助政策相冲突。亚裔美国策展人则与美国公民身份和国族认同制度抗争——这些制度把他们框定为 “ 无法同化的异族 ”——并努力创造文化生产场所，提醒国家其与亚洲在经济、劳动和战争中的历史联系。[35] 然而，塑造他们参与全球艺术的不同文化民族主义话语，在对话过程中导致了微妙的两极分化，使双方显得更紧张而非同感。

The conversation had entered uncertain terrain, where the borders of Asia (as a geopolitical and cultural region) and Asian America (as a geographically based political coalition that deploys notions of a common culture) abraded one other, and where the translation of identity could only be uttered haltingly. For Huang Du, Wang Yin, and the other artists, a sense of fidelity to or kinship with China grew out of a shared language and historical experience of being Third World in relation to the United States or even other parts of Asia such as Japan; theirs was a heroic liumang (hooligan) nationalism apropos the international stage, where they felt they must prove China worthy of inclusion and by doing so might increase the opportunities currently available to them as culture workers at home. They became comrades in discomfort with their dependency on the West (and its interpreters) for this recognition, even if it is a West with an Asian face. Eungie Joo, Doryun Chong, and René de Guzman, however, might be said to advocate a Pan-Asian fidelity or kinship born of the racialized politics of the United States, where they too felt besieged in relation to a contemporary art world whose exclusivity they challenged. These different versions of who is inside or outside, speaking nearby, represent a moment of coauthorship, but also of fractious claims to oppositionality that strain to recognize one another.

对话进入了不确定的地带：亚洲（作为地缘政治和文化区域）与亚裔美国（作为基于地理的政治联盟，运用共同文化的观念）的边界相互摩擦，而身份认同的翻译只能结结巴巴地说出。对黄笃、王音和其他艺术家而言，对中国保持忠诚或亲缘感，源于共同语言和作为第三世界相对于美国，甚至日本等亚洲其他地区的共同历史经验；他们的民族主义是面对国际舞台时英雄式的流氓（liumang）民族主义——他们觉得自己必须证明中国配得上被纳入，并借此增加他们作为国内文化工作者目前可获得的机会。他们对依赖西方（及其阐释者）给予这种承认感到同样的不安，并因此成为同志，即便那是一个长着亚洲面孔的西方。然而，也可以说 Eungie Joo、Doryun Chong 和勒内·德古兹曼倡导一种源自美国种族化政治的泛亚忠诚或亲缘感；在美国，他们同样感到被一个他们质疑其排他性的当代艺术世界围困。这些关于谁在内、谁在外的不同说法在彼此近旁言说，代表一个共同书写的时刻，也代表对对立立场的好斗主张——这些主张艰难地试图相互承认。

In my blurred role as ethnographer-interpreter, I found myself positioned in different contextual ways: as an imperfect speaker of Chinese who had spent enough time in China to get cultural references like Wei Cheng; as an Asian American intimately aware of racial hierarchies and the fraught politics of inclusion; as a feminist critic of power dynamics in the art world; and as an anthropologist of cultural translations of value. I was aware from the start of disciplinary tensions between art and anthropology. I often tried to reinforce this divide because I did not want to be seen within my research community as an arbiter of aesthetic distinction with the power to provide entrée to Western art spaces. I frequently felt called on by artists to attempt this role, but I resisted it because I lacked institutional art world connections and for fear of seeming partisan to certain individuals. My one attempt to breach this divide, by advocating for more women to be included in the curators' studio visits, had backfired. The ybca curators' project description seemed to equate anthropology with orientalism in the following statement: "Wary of the limiting effects of anthropological approaches to contemporary art, we want to disrupt our complicity in the neo-orientalist gaze." I understood this wariness as emerging from an ethnic studies demand that art be read as art in a universal sense rather than ethnography, for otherwise the Asian in America remains the "unassimilable alien," a case study in foreign culture rather than cocreator in the kingdom of culture. As an ethnographer of the cultural encounters that produce what is recognized as global contemporary art, and of the aesthetic conventions that shape how those encounters unfold, my goal is not to provide a more historically or culturally accurate way to interpret artworks, but to examine the encounter of conventions as producing art world practices of meaning-making, evaluation, selection, and resistance.[36] I also remain compelled to account for those art world participants who fell out of the picture. Transnational efforts to speak a shared language of art produce exclusions, the anonymous folk painter in Wang Yin's studio or the virtually invisible Chinese woman artist.[37]

在我作为民族志学者兼口译员的模糊角色中，我发现自己以不同方式被语境定位：作为中文不完美、却在中国待得够久、能领会《围城》之类文化指涉的言说者；作为深谙种族等级和包容政治之艰险的亚裔美国人；作为艺术界权力动态的女性主义批评者；作为研究价值之文化翻译的人类学家。我从一开始就意识到艺术与人类学之间的学科张力。我常试图强化这一分界，因为我不想在研究群体中被视为审美区分的仲裁者，有权提供进入西方艺术空间的入场券。艺术家经常要求我尝试这一角色，但我拒绝了，因为我缺乏艺术界机构人脉，也害怕显得偏袒某些个人。我唯一一次试图打破这一分界，是主张让策展人参观更多女性艺术家的工作室，结果适得其反。YBCA 策展人的项目说明似乎把人类学等同于东方主义：“ 由于警惕人类学方法对当代艺术可能产生的限制，我们希望打破自身与新东方主义凝视的共谋。” 我理解这种警惕源于族裔研究的要求：艺术应被当作普遍意义上的艺术来阅读，而非民族志；否则，在美国的亚洲人仍将是 “ 无法同化的异族 ”，是异国文化的案例研究，而非文化王国的共同创造者。作为研究生产所谓全球当代艺术之文化相遇的民族志学者，也作为研究塑造这些相遇如何展开之审美惯例的学者，我的目标不是提供一种在历史上或文化上更准确地阐释艺术品的方式，而是考察惯例的相遇如何生产艺术界意义制造、评价、选择和抵抗的实践。[36] 我也仍感到有责任说明那些从画面中掉落的艺术界参与者。用共同艺术语言言说的跨国努力制造排斥：王音工作室里匿名的民间画师，或几乎隐形的中国女性艺术家。[37]

After the curators departed, they proceeded to select artists, develop exhibit themes, and arrange for artwork to be shipped to their gallery spaces. The conversation also continued on the other side of the Pacific, where their hosts transformed the interaction into global assertions of their own. Huang Du, for example, published a series of dialogues between curators—himself and colleagues from Cuba, Germany, Japan, and the United States—in the Chinese journal Jinri xianfeng (Avant-garde today). His introduction to the published interviews asserts that curatorial work necessitates nothing less than the globe as its playing field: "In fact, prominent art curators, no matter whether they work from theory to realization, or from realization to theory, must have a macroscopic and global visual field.... Curators play a bridge-like role of enabling dialogue and exchange between artist, the exhibit, and its audience."[38]

策展人离开后，他们继续挑选艺术家、发展展览主题，并安排作品运往画廊空间。对话也在太平洋彼岸继续，那里的主人把互动转化为自身的全球主张。例如，黄笃在中文杂志《今日先锋》上发表了一系列他与古巴、德国、日本和美国同行策展人的对话。他为访谈所写的导言断言，策展工作必须以全球为竞技场：“ 事实上，杰出的艺术策展人，无论从理论到实现，还是从实现到理论，都必须具有宏观的全球视野……策展人扮演着促成艺术家、展览及其观众之间对话与交流的桥梁角色。”[38]

Beijing under the mandate to become a global city that would attract the world's attention also suggests one final translation. The urban redevelopment model that led to the creation of the Yerba Buena Center, in which art symbolizes a city's urbane distinction but also critiques the wreckage created in the attainment of this goal, was transplanted across the Pacific to sites like the East Modern Art Center described in chapter 2. Some months before Time After Time: Asia and Our Moment opened at the ybca, Wang Yin became curator for the first exhibit held at Beijing's One World Art Center, housed within a commodity apartment complex of the same name.

在受命成为吸引世界目光的全球城市这一背景下，北京还提示出最后一次翻译。催生耶尔巴布埃纳中心的城市再开发模式，被跨越太平洋移植到第二章所述远洋艺术中心等地。在这一模式中，艺术象征城市的文雅区隔，却也批判达成这一目标过程中制造的废墟。在《一次又一次：亚洲与我们此刻》于 YBCA 开幕前几个月，王音成为北京一世界艺术中心首展的策展人，该中心位于同名商品房小区内。

I had gone to the center to meet another artist for an interview, but we got waylaid by a group of Belgian university students who had arranged to talk to Wang and several of the artists from his exhibit. The students had funding from their national ministry of culture to investigate contemporary art in China and develop cultural contacts between the two countries but had sparse language skills to do so. I was cajoled into interpreting what was, by now, a fairly familiar conversation. One of the first questions asked by the Belgians was why Chinese contemporary art borrowed so much from the West. The question, in the same breath that it expressed a Western desire for art untainted by the traffic of the world, waiting only to be discovered, also framed Chinese contemporary art as lacking in originality. In the midst of the ensuing discussion, in which several artists took the students to task for their naïve assumption of overwhelming Western influence and Chinese derivativeness, a latecomer, the artist He An, walked in and was brought up to speed. He immediately replied, with a deadpan expression on his face, "I don't really know anything about Belgium except that you make good guns and now you sell them to the Chinese military." The students were completely thrown by this display of willful disdain for their country's culture, which is what they thought they'd come to exchange in the One World Art Center, and the seeming accusation that their nation's military industry fueled Chinese nationalism. He An's form of "saying no" underlined the historical legacy that lurks behind Chinese-Western cultural and economic exchange. As the Belgian students scrambled to defend the peaceful ambitions of their small country and the good will behind their visit, He An watched his work of reversals unfold, with a complex intentionality of its own that also had the artists feinting with the shadow of a question that still lingered: Is there a difference between colonization and self-colonization? They had, after all, consented to spend their afternoon hosting a group of curious but uninformed students sent by the Belgian Ministry of Culture.

我去中心是为采访另一位艺术家，但我们被一群比利时大学生耽搁了——他们安排与王音及其展览的几位艺术家交谈。这些学生获得本国文化部资助，来考察中国当代艺术、发展两国文化联系，却几乎没有相应的语言能力。我被劝说为一场如今已相当熟悉的对话担任口译。比利时人最先问的问题之一是，为什么中国当代艺术从西方借鉴了这么多。这个问题在表达西方渴望未受世界流通污染、只待被发现的艺术的同时，也把中国当代艺术框定为缺乏原创性。在随后的讨论中，几位艺术家责备学生天真地假定西方影响压倒一切、中国只会模仿；这时，迟到的艺术家何岸走进来，被告知了前情。他立刻面无表情地回答：“我对比利时真不太了解，只知道你们枪造得好，现

在又卖给中国军队。”学生们被这种对本国文化的故意轻蔑完全打乱了阵脚——他们以为来到一世界艺术中心是为了交流文化——也被那看似指控其国家军工助长中国民族主义的话打乱。何岸的“说不”形式，强调了中西文化与经济交换背后潜伏的历史遗产。当比利时学生匆忙捍卫小国的和平抱负和此行的善意时，何岸看着自己的逆转作品展开，其中自有复杂的意图性，也让艺术家们与一个仍然萦绕的问题之影过招：殖民与自我殖民之间是否存在差异？毕竟，他们同意花一下午接待一群由比利时文化部派来的好奇却无知的学生。

In a 1957 speech addressed to China's youth, Mao Zedong declared, "The world is yours, but it is also ours." His use of "the world" in relation to who defines it marks a distinction between generations, between the revolutionary founders of the nation and the youthful inheritors of this vision. As a phrase appropriated by contemporary artists, it also registers the difference between world visions, and of what art represents within them, held by various art world participants.[39] In the next chapter, a monumental art project following the historical route of the Red Army's Long March demonstrates an ongoing preoccupation with this discrepancy between art worldings. Its curators resurrected Mao Zedong's revolutionary nationalism to reverse the status quo directionality of art translation efforts. Instead of sending Chinese artists into the Western world, they attempted to draw global attention to Chinese contemporary art by hosting well-known Western artists in China, within the cultural context of world communism. This reconfiguration of global-local relations also nested feminist art encounters within the global-local and East-West encounters that shaped Chinese contemporary art. Again, I found myself drawn in as an interpreter and witness, this time to Chinese female artists finding their own way of "saying no."

在 1957 年对中国青年的讲话中，毛泽东宣布：“世界是你们的，也是我们的。”他对“世界”的用法，以及谁界定世界，标志着代际区分——国家的革命奠基者与这一愿景的青年继承者之间。作为当代艺术家挪用的说法，它也记录了各种艺术界参与者所持世界愿景的差异，以及艺术在这些愿景中所代表之物的差异。[39] 下一章将展示一个沿红军长征历史路线行进的大型艺术项目，它以持续的方式关注艺术世界营造之间的这种差异。其策展人复活毛泽东的革命民族主义，以逆转艺术转译活动既有的流动方向。他们不是把中国艺术家送往西方世界，而是试图通过在世界共产主义的文化语境中邀请知名西方艺术家来中国，把全球注意力吸引到中国当代艺术上。这种对全球—地方关系的重新配置，也把女性主义艺术相遇嵌套在塑造中国当代艺术的全球—地方与东西方相遇之中。再一次，我发现自己作为口译员和见证者被拉入其中，这一次是中国女性艺术家寻找自己的“说不”方式。

My complicity in the process as well as frustrated effort to intervene led me to eventually curate an exhibit of Chinese feminist art. Cruel/Loving Bodies brought together a group of artists whose work explored, in various embodied ways, an intersection of Chinese and gendered identity. This framework disavowed any particular claims of what a man or woman is or should be, or of what it means to be Chinese. It aimed to elicit a dialogue among artists from Mainland China, Hong Kong, and Great Britain dealing with these questions. The exhibit opened in Shanghai, linked to a conference on feminist thought, at the Duolun Museum of Modern Art in June 2004, before traveling to Beijing's 798 Space in July of the same year and the Hong Kong Arts Center and, ironically enough, Goethe Institute in 2006. On July 28, 2002, fourteen Chinese artists traveled on foot and in cars along a rain-washed dirt and gravel road from the village of Luoshui to a new wooden guesthouse on the shore of Lugu Lake. Upon arriving, the artists gathered in the courtyard of the two-story inn, built to resemble a traditional Mosuo dwelling, and examined the art proposals hung on the walls of the first floor. Two camera crews set up their equipment beneath flimsy hand-held umbrellas and began filming the artists as they heatedly discussed the whereabouts of Judy Chicago, icon of the U.S. feminist art movement, with whom they were to meet that morning. They had traveled to this remote corner of Yunnan Province in southwestern China in response to an online call issued by Chicago three months earlier (figure 4.01). Her proposal, organized around the theme "What If Women Ruled the World," suggested a feminist art gathering in this location of renown among anthropologists, Lonely Planet backpackers, and tourists seeking either sexual titillation or feminist inspiration, all attracted by the matrilineal culture of the Mosuo, a Chinese ethnic minority. Chicago had been invited by Lu Jie, chief curator of The Long March: A Walking Visual Display, to serve as guest curator for this site, one of twenty planned for an art project following the route of the Communist Red Army's 1934 Long March. Once all participants finally converged at Lugu Lake, any utopian expectation of transnational feminist collaboration quickly faded. After a group meeting with Chicago, many of the Chinese artists worried their work would be appropriated. Hours of internal debate led them to issue a manifesto, and on that morning in the guesthouse courtyard, they waited for her to emerge and respond.

2002 年 7 月 28 日，十四位中国艺术家徒步或乘车，沿着一条被雨水冲刷的土石路，从落水村前往泸沽湖畔一座新建的木制客栈。到达后，艺术家们聚集在这座仿摩梭传统民居建造的两层客栈院子里，查看一楼墙上挂着的艺术方案。两个摄制组在单薄的手持雨伞下架好设备，开始拍摄艺术家们热烈讨论朱迪·芝加哥（Judy Chicago）的下落——这位美国女性主义艺术运动的偶像，本应在那天上午与他们见面。三个月前，芝加哥在网上发出征集，他们因此来到中国西南云南省这个偏远角落（图 4.01）。她的方案围绕“如果女人统治世界”这一主题组织，提议在这个人类学家、《孤独星球》背包客，以及寻求性刺激或女性主义灵感之旅的游客都熟悉的地方，举行一次女性主义艺术聚会——吸引他们的都是中国少数民族摩梭人的母系文化。芝加哥受《长征：一个行走中的视觉展示》总策展人卢杰邀请，担任这一地点的客座策展人；该地点是计划中二十个地点之一，整个艺术项目沿共产党红军 1934 年长征路线行进。当所有参与者最终汇聚泸沽湖时，任何乌托邦式的跨国女性主义合作期待都迅速消退。在与芝加哥举行小组会议后，许多中国艺术家担心自己的作品会被挪用。数小时内部辩论使他们发表了一份宣言；那天早晨，他们在客栈院子里等她出来回应。

Lu Jie and Qiu Zhijie, the chief and assistant curators of The Long March, conceived of the Lugu Lake exhibit as site six on an ambitious five-month traveling art show to follow the route of the original Long March. In 1934, the Communist Red Army, under attack by the Guomindang in the southeast, began a six-thousand-mile trek to the northwest. They abandoned prior attempts to revolutionize the urban proletariat and shifted their propaganda efforts toward a rural population, lecturing to peasants and garnering support for their guerrilla tactics as they marched through the interior to an eventual base in Yan'an, Shaanxi Province. This grueling yearlong ordeal serves as a foundational story about the consolidation of the Chinese Communist Party and its maxim "to serve the people" through teaching and learning from them. This tenet of Maoist praxis rejected colonial stagist history.[1] The peasantry, rather than relegated to a period of development before they could become new citizen-subjects, were called on to play a vital and immediate role in shaping national revolutionary consciousness. In his 1942 "Talks at the Yan'an Conference on Literature and Art," Mao Zedong cemented this mode of political consciousness-raising to cultural production. He borrowed Lenin's phrase to describe art and literature as "a screw in the whole machine" of proletarian revolution and asserted their goals of exposing imperialist and class enemies, reaching a wider audience, and raising standards. He declared that cultural workers must prioritize "the task of understanding people and getting to know them properly," in order to create literature and art that would be the result of "the revolutionary's mind reflecting and processing popular life."[2]

With Yan'an planned as the final site for the 2002 "walking visual display," Lu Jie, who holds a master's degree in curatorial studies from Goldsmiths College, University of London, revisited this moment of artistic manifesto-making in the sixtieth anniversary year of Mao's "Talks," not with the aim of advocating world revolutionary socialism but of integrating China with the global art system. His self-professed goals were to introduce international contemporary art to China's "peripheral population" and to draw international attention to Chinese contemporary art. Financed by a foundation set up in New York and headquartered in Beijing, The Long March was launched in Ruijin, Jiangxi Province, starting point of the original Long March and host now to "red tourism" pilgrims. His curatorial team organized several events here, including a screening of La Chinoise in Mixi village, site of the first Red Army headquarters. The projection of Jean Luc-Godard's 1967 film about young Maoist revolutionaries in Paris on a makeshift fabric screen hung in a village ancestral hall emblematized Lu's overall effort to revisit and instigate cross-cultural artistic dialogue. His restaging of the march was partial, highly interpretive, and designed to provoke. The "comrades" he mobilized traveled with a media entourage of camera people by plane, train, and bus. They did not become involved in any sustained learning from rural communities, but their strategic resuscitation of the Long March as political praxis demanded recognition of Chinese cultural production as worth learning from, as innovative rather than derivative. Lu Jie invited and funded Western artists to join their endeavor, to work and learn alongside Chinese artists.

由于延安被计划为 2002 年“行走中的视觉展示”的终点，拥有伦敦大学金匠学院策展研究硕士学位的卢杰，在毛泽东《讲话》发表六十周年之际重新回到这个艺术宣言制作的时刻——不是为了倡导世界革命社会主义，而是为了把中国融入全球艺术体系。他自称的目标包括把国际当代艺术介绍给中国“边缘人群”，并把国际注意力吸引到中国当代艺术上。《长征》由一家在纽约成立、总部设在北京的基金会资助，在江西省瑞金启动——原始长征的起点，如今是“红色旅游”朝圣者的目的地。他的策展团队在此组织了数场活动，包括在红军第一个总部所在地密溪村放映《中国姑娘》。把让-吕克·戈达尔 1967 年这部关于巴黎青年毛主义革命者的影片，投放到挂在村庄祠堂里的临时布幕上，象征了卢杰重新造访并激发跨文化艺术对话的整体努力。他对长征的重演是局部的、高度阐释性的，且意在挑衅。他动员的“同志们”带着摄影摄像媒体团队，乘飞机、火车和大巴行进。他们没有参与任何持续向农村社区学习的过程，但他们把长征战略性地复活为政治实践，要求承认中国文化生产值得学习，是创新的而非派生的。卢杰邀请并资助西方艺术家加入他们的行动，与中国艺术家一起工作和学习。

This promotion of cosmopolitan Chinese culture via a return to the socialist past demonstrates the hybrid hallmarks of the reform-era culture industry. Its promoters aimed to integrate with global capitalism but in a way that drew on culturally specific legacies and differentiated them from the West.[3] Lu Jie played on the cultural distinction of the Long March, while simultaneously loosening it from its socialist referent and rejection of individual authorship. His Long March intermingled different orders of worldliness—the global 1960s circulation of Maoism and the neocolonial hierarchies of contemporary global art—to chart an art worlding in which Chinese socialist modernity serves as a living historical resource, in which China is not catching up, but was already avant-garde. This embrace of Maoist culture highlighted the instability of one of its key signs, that of "woman." What was it, is it to be a woman, a Chinese woman, or a new woman? Who has the power to author her? What resources do female cultural producers draw on in their struggle to be recognized as authors of their own sign? Responses to these questions arose in dissonant ways at site six of the Long March.

Although none of the Red Army troops actually reached Lugu Lake, Lu and his assistant curator Qiu Zhijie, a well-known conceptual artist based in Beijing, deemed it close enough to the original Long March route to include on their itinerary. With its well-documented matrilineal Mosuo culture, Lugu Lake seemed the perfect locale for a feminist theme. Their original prospectus for site six ranged broadly: it proposed projects on the lives of Grandma Xiao, a Mosuo supporter of the Red Army in the 1930s, and Yang Erche Namu, a Mosuo pop sensation who transformed a brief music career into a industry of self-promotion that has included the publication of nine memoirs; as well as public on-site readings of Julia Kristeva's About Chinese Women and Simone de Beauvoir's The Second Sex.[4] Of these two French feminists, Kristeva in particular provided a conceptual bridge; in 1974, she had traveled to China with editorial members of the literary journal Tel Quel, which for several years embraced Maoism. In spite of stated curatorial plans to include Mosuo women in the project, the necessary work of building local connections was never carried out. Over a year in advance, however, Lu convinced Chicago to join the project. Excited by what she learned about the Mosuo from materials Lu sent her, Chicago felt compelled to spread the word about their alternative sexual and kinship practices, especially to Chinese women who might not know of this culture within their own national borders. Lu translated her call for submissions of artworks to exhibit or create at Lugu Lake and posted it on a popular Chinese art website. Chicago asked artists to consider Mosuo society as a feminist inspiration: "Just like in the Lugu Lake area, 'if women ruled the world,' what would the world be like?"[5] The announcement suggested that Chicago, twelve selected artists, and twelve local Mosuo women would convene at Lugu Lake to explore the history, imaginary, myth, and reality of matriarchal society through an art exhibition. This alteration of the original curatorial plan presaged what would become a continually evolving art happening.

尽管红军部队实际上并未到达泸沽湖，卢杰和助理策展人、北京知名观念艺术家邱志杰认为这里足够接近原始长征路线，可以列入行程。泸沽湖有记载详备的摩梭母系文化，似乎是女性主义主题的完美地点。他们为第六站撰写的最初策划书范围宽泛：提议以 1930 年代支持红军的摩梭人肖奶奶，以及摩梭流行明星杨二车娜姆的生平为项目——杨二车娜姆把短暂的歌唱生涯转变为自我推销产业，包括出版九部回忆录；还提议在泸沽湖现场公开朗读朱莉娅·克里斯蒂娃的《中国妇女》和西蒙娜·德·波伏娃的《第二性》。[4] 在这两位法国女性主义者中，克里斯蒂娃尤其提供了概念桥梁；1974 年，她与文学杂志《原样》（Tel Quel）编辑成员一起访华，该杂志曾拥护毛泽东主义数年。尽管策划书声称要让摩梭女性参与项目，建立本地联系的必要工作从未落实。然而，卢杰提前一年多就说服芝加哥加入。芝加哥从卢杰寄给她的材料中了解到摩梭人，兴奋不已，觉得自己必须传播他们另类的性与亲属实践，尤其是告诉那些可能不知道自己国境内存在这种文化的中国女性。卢杰把芝加哥征集在泸沽湖展出或创作作品的呼吁翻译成中文，发布在一个流行的中国艺术网站上。芝加哥请艺术家把摩梭社会视为女性主义灵感：“ 就像在泸沽湖地区那样，‘ 如果女人统治世界 ’，世界会是什么样？ ”[5] 公告称芝加哥、十二位入选艺术家和十二位本地摩梭女性将在泸沽湖聚集，通过一场艺术展览探索母权社会的历史、想象、神话与现实。对原策划的这种改动，预示着它将成为一场不断演变的艺术事件。

My participation began in Beijing, with meetings and phone calls with Lu Jie, Qiu Zhijie, and Beijing-based artists. Many of these artists eventually decided not to become involved, but after communicating with artists in Sichuan and Yunnan, two of them chose to go to Lugu Lake. They convinced me to join them because they knew I had a video camera. Lu Jie had arranged for a television crew to follow The Long March, and the artists who planned to meet with Judy Chicago at Lugu Lake worried that these “official” cameras wouldn’t record whatever might transpire from their perspective. They pulled me in as an ethnographer of the project, although at the moment I became witness to it, I also mediated it: through how I wielded my camera, weighed in on erupting debates, and served as interpreter for their interactions with Judy Chicago.

我的参与始于北京，与卢杰、邱志杰和北京艺术家们开会、通电话。他们中许多人最终决定不参与，但在与四川和云南的艺术家沟通后，其中两人选择前往泸沽湖。他们说服我同行，因为他们知道我有摄像机。卢杰已安排电视摄制组跟拍《长征》，而计划在泸沽湖与朱迪·芝加哥会面的艺术家担心，这些“ 官方 ” 镜头不会从他们的视角记录可能发生的一切。他们把我拉进来，作为项目的民族志学者；然而在我成为其见证者的那一刻，我也中介了它：通过我如何运用摄像机、如何介入爆发的辩论，以及如何为他们与朱迪·芝加哥的互动担任口译。

This chapter tells several stories, or a story of several layers. The first is one of emergent worlds, which argues for the role of ethnography in understanding art as more than a collection of stable objects reflecting the world. On the shore of Lugu Lake, visions of the world collided. The artworks created out of the encounter represent momentary crystallizations of artists' ongoing thought processes and material experiments with particular media, technologies of image making, and the gendered histories of both. The next layer of the story explores this encounter in relation to questions about cultural globalization. It demonstrates the unstable relations between "global" and "local" and how sociocultural forms labeled global and considered universal, like contemporary art or feminism, are multiply produced through uneven global encounters. The impulse to craft a common or even a shared narrative can instead create fractures. Another layer of the story asks how this fracturing or decentering of globality necessitates a reassessment of institutionalized narratives of global feminist art. What it means for Chinese contemporary art to go global demands feminist attention to questions of gender, power, and aesthetic form immanent in social worlds of visual production. The nesting of feminist art encounters within global–local and East–West encounters forces a rethinking of conventional center-periphery relations and therefore of discourses about global art and global feminism. The struggles that occurred at Lugu Lake revolved around the question of feminism in Chinese contemporary art repeatedly raised in the capital. In this off-center location, female artists asserted a demand for equity often lost or overshadowed in Beijing's race for recognition. Finally, this is a story of rural–urban relations in China, the flipside of artists depicting rural migrants in Beijing, in which artists go down to the countryside, a longstanding socialist practice. While the road espoused by Mao Zedong beginning with the Long March envisioned the countryside as the foundation of Communist China that would encircle and revolutionize the semicolonial, parasitic city, the rapid urbanization of the economic-reform era reversed this ideological geography. The development of a postsocialist urban aesthetics, what Robin Visser describes as "cities surround the countryside," was deeply part of emerging Chinese art worlds in which cities were understood as the motor of culture even as affective attachments often still lay in past socialist privileging of rural people and places.[6]

Long March as Seeding Machine

来源位置：140, 141

Lei Yan's curiosity was sparked when she read Judy Chicago's online call for proposals on her home computer in Kunming one day after it was posted on April 28, 2002. A former soldier, she was intimately acquainted with the story of the Red Army's Long March. Questions about gender difference raised by her experience in a male-dominated military family also made Chicago's thematic proposition intriguing. That night Lei Yan called her friend Sun Guojuan, an artist who splits her time between Beijing and her hometown of Kunming, and told her that she wanted to join this activity. Although Sun did not feel the same inherent interest in the proposal, she agreed to accompany her friend on an advance scouting trip to Lugu Lake. Before their departure on May 3, their discussion of possible pieces turned to the idea of leaving something at Lugu Lake to return to later. Suddenly a famous historical dictum popped out of Lei's mouth: "The Long March is a manifesto, a propaganda force, a seeding machine." They decided to take hempseed to scatter on the bank of Lugu Lake. The action of scattering, conceived of as a performance piece, drew on the history of the Long March as means of ideological dissemination and suggested symbolic possibilities. The first was the potential of the artworks produced as part of The Long March Lugu Lake exhibit to spread out and transmit new ideas about art and gender. The second conceptualized hemp or marijuana seeds as symbolic of capitalism's bourgeois way of life and conjectured that when scattered in a field of "plain, modest, proletarian" corn, the two plants would grow strong together as in "socialism with Chinese characteristics." Both artists kept journals of their trip in the form of battlefield reports (figure 4.02), decorated with drawings by Lei Yan that referenced hand-produced military unit newspapers. A side column declared, "By recording our ideas for participating in the Long March plan, we employ the most primary propaganda tactic of the Red Army's Long March. We use the idea of sowing seeds to transmit the beliefs and ideas of our creative work."[7] Their avant-garde, in the literal sense, action provides a metaphor for the larger encounter that took place almost three months later. Along with Lei and Sun, artists from around China, to whom Chicago was generally well known, began to submit proposals. Sowing Hempseed might also represent the various individuals and aspirations set in motion by the Long March project: a seeding machine that mixed different elements in a strategically chosen field, yielding unpredictable results.

朱迪·芝加哥的网上征集于 2002 年 4 月 28 日发布，次日，雷燕在昆明家中的电脑上读到它，好奇心被点燃。她当过兵，对红军长征的故事非常熟悉。她在男性主导的军人家庭中的经历所引发的性别差异问题，也使芝加哥的主题提议显得有趣。当晚，雷燕给朋友孙国娟打电话——这位艺术家在北京和家乡昆明之间往来——告诉她自己想参加这个活动。孙国娟对此提议并无同样的内在兴趣，但仍同意陪朋友先去泸沽湖探路。5 月 3 日出发前，她们讨论可能的作品时，想到在泸沽湖留下什么东西，日后再回来。雷燕突然脱口说出一句著名的历史格言："长征是宣言书，是宣传队，是播种机。"她们决定带大麻籽，撒在泸沽湖岸边。这一撒种行为被构想为一件行为作品，借鉴长征作为意识形态传播手段的历史，并提示多种象征可能。第一，是作为《长征》泸沽湖展览一部分创作的作品有潜力传播关于艺术与性别的新观念。第二，是把大麻籽象征为资本主义资产阶级生活方式，并推测把它撒在"朴素、谦逊、无产阶级"的玉米地里，两种植物会像"中国特色社会主义"那样一起茁壮成长。两位艺术家都以战地报道的形式记录此行（图 4.02），并配以雷燕参照手工制作部队报纸所作的绘画。侧栏宣称："通过记录我们参与长征计划的构想，我们采用红军长征最原始的宣传工作方式。我们用播种的观念来传递创作工作的信念与思想。"[7] 她们字面意义上的

先锋行为，为近三个月后发生的更大相遇提供了隐喻。与雷燕和孙国娟一起，来自中国各地、普遍熟知芝加哥的艺术家开始提交方案。《播撒大麻籽》也可以代表长征项目所启动的各种个体与愿望：一台在战略选择的地里混合不同元素的播种机，产出不可预测的结果。

Judy Chicago, originally Judy Cohen, changed her surname to the city of her birth as a protest against patriarchal naming traditions. The reputation of the artist as icon of 1970s feminist art in the United States rests most solidly on her piece The Dinner Party (1975–79). Both attacked and celebrated, this large-scale installation has "long been thought of as the feminist art manifesto, par excellence."[8] In collaboration with historians and other artists, Chicago created a table in the shape of an equilateral triangle with place settings for thirty-nine women of mythical or historical significance, from the Primordial Goddess to Sojourner Truth to Georgia O'Keefe. The opening in the table's center reveals a white tile floor painted with the names of 999 additional women. The identity of each woman at the table is crafted through intricately stitched table runners and porcelain plates painted with vulvar motifs, some sculpted in three-dimensional relief.[9] Chicago rooted this monumental effort to reclaim women's role in history and art in her belief in premodern matriarchal culture.[10]

朱迪 • 芝加哥原名朱迪 • 科恩，为抗议父权命名传统，她把姓氏改为出生城市的名字。她作为 1970 年代美国女性主义艺术偶像的声誉，最牢固地建立在其作品《晚宴》（1975—79）之上。这件大型装置既受攻击也受赞颂，“ 长期以来一直被视为女性主义艺术的宣言书，典范之作 ”。[8] 芝加哥与

历史学家及其他艺术家合作，制作了一张等边三角形的桌子，为三十九位神话或历史中的女性设置席位，从原初女神到索杰纳·特鲁思，再到乔治亚·欧姬芙。桌子中央的开口露出铺着白瓷砖的地面，上面绘有另外 999 位女性的名字。每位女性的身份由精心缝制的桌旗和绘有外阴图案的瓷盘构成，其中一些以三维浮雕塑成。[9] 芝加哥把这项重夺女性在历史与艺术中地位的纪念碑式努力，扎根于她对前现代母权文化的信念。[10]

While Chicago's online proposal piqued the interest of many Chinese artists, disputes arose around how to interpret the project's direction. Were they to consider the largely forgotten history of the some two thousand women who participated in the original Long March; the relationship between the Han majority of China and the southwestern ethnic minority group of the Mosuo; or the power dynamics of an international art world still largely driven by the West and by men? Why were so few women invited to participate in the rest of Lu's The Long March, with Lugu Lake a seeming push to segregate them in a single location? And, why was such a large portion of the budget allocated to host Judy Chicago's travels in China, when the same amount could support the cost of materials and travel for numerous Chinese women to participate in the exhibit? When questioned about this last executive decision, which the artists had correctly inferred, Lu Jie insisted the presence of such a prominent figure would set the stage for greater debate. He tacked on the statement that he wished to "re-educate Judy Chicago." In this ambiguous addendum, Lu possibly got carried away with his tongue-in-cheek adoption of Communist political language, or registered the internal contradictions of his own role. He stood aware of the necessity for a big name and a big issue (enter Chicago and her controversial feminism) to garner international attention, yet this need was exactly what he hoped to overturn in the art world.

芝加哥的网上提议激起许多中国艺术家的兴趣，但围绕如何理解项目方向出现了争议。他们是应当考虑参加原始长征的约两千名女性这段大体被遗忘的历史；考虑中国汉族多数与西南少数民族摩梭人的关系；还是考虑仍主要由西方和男性驱动的国际艺术世界的权力动态？为什么卢杰《长征》其余部分邀请的女性如此之少，仿佛泸沽湖是为了把她们隔离在单一地点？为什么预算中有如此大一部分用于接待朱迪·芝加哥在中国旅行，而同样的钱可以支持众多中国女性参展的材料和差旅费用？当被问及这最后一个执行决定——艺术家们正确地推断出了它——卢杰坚称，这样一位显赫人物的到场会为更大辩论搭建舞台。他又补充说，他希望“重新教育朱迪·芝加哥”。在这句含糊的补充中，卢杰或许是对自己半开玩笑挪用共产党政治语言入了迷，或许是无意间暴露了自己角色的内在矛盾。他清楚知道需要一个大名字和一个大议题（于是有了芝加哥及其有争议的女性主义）来吸引国际关注，而这种需要恰恰是他希望在艺术界推翻的。

Ill will began to surface when several Beijing-based artists withdrew after being told the organizers would not help pay their expenses to Lugu Lake, something they asserted had been verbally promised to them when Lu Jie had solicited their participation. They had also grown uncomfortable with what they saw as a male curatorial effort to partition the majority of The Long March female participants to a single, marginal site. Three other Beijing women with rising art world profiles—Jiang Jie, Lin Tianmiao, and Yin Xiuzhen—had been invited to display pieces along with male peers at other sites, and the slight felt by the women relegated to the Lugu Lake activity contributed to their eventual boycott. As debate about site six of the project flared, I met in Beijing with Lu Jie and Qiu Zhijie to pursue more information about it. Upon hearing of my research interests in feminist art, they similarly sounded me out and suggested that I should come along as an ethnographic collaborator.[11] Meanwhile, Lu revised the curatorial plan again. Overwhelmed by the number of submitted proposals and not wanting to reject any of the artists who had responded, he changed the format to a "proposals exhibit." He informed artists that all proposals would be displayed at Lugu Lake. If they wanted to travel there to exhibit or create original works, they would have to cover their own expenses. When artists tried to clarify how the event would be organized, they were told to just show up with art in hand. When others complained about the financial difficulty of making the journey, they were told that the comrades of the original Long March knew how to "eat bitterness." In Beijing, word traveled quickly about how the project represented an attempt to exploit Chinese women artists for the international reputation of its male curators. Some promoted boycotting the event as the reproduction of a male power structure unsurprisingly similar to that of the original march. Their criticisms recognized the hierarchies of both global contemporary art and historical Chinese socialism, even as they failed to call into question Lugu Lake as a site for the encounter of these issues. Except for an artist from Sichuan, Zhang Lun, who traveled in advance to Mosuo territory to learn about the issues that mattered to people there, they seemed uncharacteristically uncritical in their consumption of conventional representations of Mosuo.

当几位北京艺术家得知主办方不会帮助支付前往泸沽湖的费用，因而退出时，不满开始显现——他们声称卢杰邀请他们参与时曾口头承诺过。他们也逐渐感到不安，因为在他们看来，这是男性策展努力把《长征》的大部分女性参与者分割到一个边缘地点。另外三位艺术界声望日升的北京女性——姜杰、林天苗和尹秀珍——曾被邀请与其他男性同行一起在其他地点展示作品；被贬到泸沽湖活动的女性所感到的轻慢，促成了她们最终的抵制。随着关于项目第六站的辩论激化，我在北京与卢杰、邱志杰见面，希望了解更多信息。听说我对女性主义艺术的研究兴趣后，他们也同样试探我，并建议我作为民族志合作者同行。[11] 与此同时，卢杰再次修改策展计划。他被提交的方案数量压倒，又不想拒绝任何回应的艺术家，于是把形式改为“方案展”。他通知艺术家，所有方案都将在泸沽湖展示。如果他们想前往那里展示或创作原作，必须自负费用。当艺术家试图弄清活动将如何组织时，他们被告知带着作品出现就行。当其他人抱怨旅途的经济困难时，他们被告知原始长征的同志们懂得如何“吃苦”。在北京，消息迅速传开：这个项目代表着利用中国女性艺术家为其男性策展人的国际声望去牟利。一些人推动抵制活动，认为它复制了男性权力结构，与原来的长征相似，这并不令人意外。他们的批评认识到了全球当代艺术和中国历史社会主义的双重等级，却未能质疑泸沽湖作为这些议题相遇之地的选择。除了四川艺术家张伦提前前往摩梭地区，了解当地人关心的问题之外，他们似乎一反常态地不加批判地消费着对摩梭的常规再现。

When Judy Chicago finally arrived in China, stopping first in Beijing to present a slide lecture, frustrated artists greeted her with their questions. She tried to make the best of the situation by insisting on the importance of a joint pilgrimage to a place she described as a kind of feminist utopia, a still existing matriarchal society. She declared that she hadn't come from so far away to not cooperate with Chinese women, but if she had to, she would travel to Lugu Lake and exhibit her work in a solo stand for women's right to make art as part of The Long March. With me as Chinese-English interpreter, she explained to skeptical artists in Beijing that she had also harbored the suspicion that "this was like just this little women's thing." But she continued, "I figured that if we all got together we could make so much trouble that they would wish they had never done this. So you know that's what I was hoping. And for them to boycott it is like the absolute opposite of what should have happened."[12]

当朱迪·芝加哥终于抵达中国，先在北京作幻灯片讲座时，沮丧的艺术家们带着问题迎接她。她努力缓和局面，坚持认为共同到访她所描述的某种女性主义乌托邦、一个仍然存在的母权社会至关重要。她宣称，自己远道而来，就是要与中国女性合作；但如果不得不如此，她会前往泸沽湖，在《长征》中独自展出作品，以捍卫女性创作艺术的权利。由我担任中英口译，她向北京持怀疑态度的艺术家解释说，她也曾怀疑“这就像只是件小小的女人事情”。但她接着说：“我想，如果我们都聚在一起，我们可以制造那么多麻烦，让他们后悔做了这件事。所以你知道，这就是我所希望的。而他们抵制它，恰恰是应该发生的事情的绝对反面。”[12]

Judy Chicago's attempt to collaborate with those Chinese counterparts who did make their way to Lugu Lake continued to be a vexed encounter. I interpret this resistance to solidarity not as failure but a form of feminist practice that incites debate over who or what is the subject of feminism and over how different styles of activism interpellate or alienate. The focus on gender at Lugu Lake highlighted contradictions inherent in the project, and the Chinese contemporary art world, which I unravel by exploring the proliferating ironies they produced. I then turn to the events that led Chinese artists to issue a manifesto to Chicago and to the range of art works exhibited and created at Lugu Lake. These works reflect a larger question regarding feminism in Chinese contemporary art and the terminological trouble it created in curatorial practice. Through a review of these politics, I argue that a set of interlocking double binds arises from the art world encounter of Chinese and Western feminisms.

朱迪·芝加哥与那些确实抵达泸沽湖的中国同行合作尝试，仍然是一场棘手的相遇。我不把这种对团结的抵抗解释为失败，而视为一种女性主义实践：它引发关于谁是或什么是女性主义主体、不同行动主义风格如何询唤或疏离他人的辩论。泸沽湖对性别的聚焦，凸显了项目及中国当代艺术世界固有的矛盾；我通过探讨它们产生的不断增殖的讽刺来展开。然后，我转向导致中国艺术家向芝加哥发表宣言的事件，以及泸沽湖展出和创作的一系列作品。这些作品反映了一个关于中国当代艺术中女性主义的更大问题，以及它在策展实践中造成的术语麻烦。通过回顾这些政治，我论证中国与西方女性主义在艺术界的相遇产生了一组相互交织的双重束缚。

In The Long March: A Walking Visual Display, "women's art" became subject to exclusionary partition, literally outside of time as the only exhibit site that detoured from the historical route. The conjoining of the Long March and feminism in Mosuo territory was fantastical on multiple levels. Women's liberation as part of the Chinese Communist Party's revolutionary platform arguably experienced a step backward at the time of the Long March. While female activists played an important role in early political mobilization, especially in urban factories, they became a liability as the Communists, in their war with the Guomindang, retreated from urban centers and turned toward revolutionizing a rural population.[13] Party leaders backed off family and marriage reform for fear of alienating what they viewed now as their most important membership, the disenfranchised male peasantry who sought a return to an idealized past of control over family stability and its uninterrupted production of male lineages.[14]

在《长征：一个行走中的视觉展示》中，“女性艺术”遭到排他性分割，字面上处于时间之外——它是唯一偏离历史路线的展览地点。长征与女性主义在摩梭地区的结合，在多个层面上都是幻想的。作为中国共产党革命纲领一部分的妇女解放，在长征时期可以说经历了一次倒退。女性行动者在早期政治动员中发挥了重要作用，尤其是在城市工厂；但随着共产党在与国民党战争中撤离城市中心、转向使农村人口革命化，她们成了累赘。[13] 党的领导人放弃家庭与婚姻改革，因为害怕疏远如今被视为最重要成员的无权男性农民——他们渴望回到理想化的过去，即控制家庭稳定并持续生产男性世系。[14]

Once the Red Army had established their guerrilla base at Yan'an, one of the female comrades, well-known writer Ding Ling, published an article in 1942 in the Liberation Daily entitled "Thoughts on March 8."[15] On the occasion of International Women's Day, she exposed and satirized the internal nannü class system of Communist life at Yan'an. She opens, "When will it no longer be necessary to attach special weight to the word 'woman' and raise it specially?" She raises the Communist double bind for women mobilized on the one hand to serve the party and on the other to serve family: they are criticized as either irresponsible for not sacrificing their careers for family, or if they do, as politically backward. On marriage, Ding writes with sarcastic humor: "But women invariably want to get married. (It's even more of a sin not to be married, and single women are even more of a target for rumors and slanderous gossip.) So they can't afford to be choosy, anyone will do: whether he rides horses or wears straw sandals, whether he's an artist or a supervisor."[16] In response, party leaders attacked her as an internal dissenter and her views as an expression of "narrow feminism." Three months later, she published a self-criticism not of her original charges but of the ideological method she had used in "Thoughts on March 8," declaring, "This article is a bad article."[17]

红军在延安建立游击根据地后，一位女同志、著名作家丁玲于 1942 年在《解放日报》发表《三八节有感》。[15] 在国际妇女节之际，她揭露并讽刺延安共产主义生活内部的男女阶级制度。她开篇写道：“‘妇女’这两个字，将在什么时代才不被重视，不需要特别的被提出呢？”她提出共产党动员女性所面临的双重束缚：一方面要服务党，另一方面要服务家庭：如果不为家庭牺牲事业，就被批评为不负责任；如果牺牲了事业，又被批评为政治落后。关于婚姻，丁玲以讽刺幽默写道：“可是女人总是要结婚的。（不结婚就更其罪大，独身女人更是谣言和诽谤的对象。）因此她们不能挑剔，什么

人都行：不管他是骑马还是穿草鞋，是艺术家还是总务处长。”[16] 作为回应，党的领导人攻击她是内部异见者，称其观点为“狭隘的女性主义”表现。三个月后，她发表自我批评，不是检讨自己原来的指控，而是检讨自己在《三八节有感》中使用的思想方法，宣称：“这篇文章是篇坏文章。”[17]

Likewise, for the Mosuo, the Long March effort of ccp consolidation, as prehistory to the party state of the People's Republic of China, would pose an eventual threat to their matrilineal kinship system and custom of sese, "walking marriage." The ideal-type of Mosuo family differs significantly from that of the traditional Han lineage or modern nuclear family. Children live in their mother's household, even as adults. Men make night visits to female partners, with sexual relations initiated and continued voluntarily. Some couples form life-long relationships but continue to live separately by day, with children raised by their mothers and maternal uncles.[18] After the founding of the PRC, state ethnographers in the 1950s used Stalin's criteria for defining a nation to develop an ethnic classification system that grouped more than four hundred reported ethnic identities into fifty-five officially recognized minority nationalities, or minzu. Thomas Mullaney describes this project as "an inventive process of social engineering, not simply an attempt at neutrally reflecting primordial qualities of the non-Han social sphere."[19] The Mosuo did not receive recognition as an independent ethnic group—something they have protested to varying degrees over time—and were divided according to provincial borders, with those in Yunnan classified as Naxi, and those in Sichuan as Mongolian. As part of the official classification, ethnographers staged ethnic groups along a scale of classical Marxist evolution characterized by five major production modes: primitive (or primordial communist), slave, feudal, capitalist, and socialist. They placed groups with matrilineal family systems at the primitive end of an evolutionary timeline. Viewed as a "living fossils" who had to be disciplined into modern national norms, the Mosuo were subjected in the late 1960s and early 1970s to an official "one husband, one wife" policy that broke up families, forced them into married household units, and regulated their sexuality and reproduction.[20] Since economic reform, representations of the Mosuo circulated by domestic and foreign travel writers, journalists, and filmmakers have depicted them as matriarchal and sexually liberated from the strictures of modern life. As Eileen Walsh notes, "In an ironic reversal, the cultural characteristics the Maoist government tried to change became celebrated as markers of Mosuo cultural uniqueness and value."[21]

同样，对摩梭人而言，长征中中共巩固的努力作为中华人民共和国党国史前史，最终对其母系亲属制度和“色色”（sese，即走婚）习俗构成威胁。摩梭家庭的理想类型与传统汉人世系或现代核心家庭显著不同。孩子即使成年也住在母亲家中。男子夜间拜访女性伴侣，性关系自愿开始并持续。一些伴侣结成终身关系，但白天仍分开居住，孩子由母亲和舅舅抚养。[18] 中华人民共和国成立后，1950 年代的国家民族志学者使用斯大林定义民族的标准，发展出一套民族分类体系，把四百多个上报的民族身份归为五十五个官方承认的少数民族（minzu）。托马斯·穆拉尼（Thomas Mullaney）把这一项目描述为“一项创造性的社会工程，而非中立反映非汉社会领域原始特质的尝试”。[19] 摩梭人未获承认为独立民族——他们为此在不同时期以不同方式抗议——并按省界划分：云南的划为纳西族，四川的划为蒙古族。作为官方分类的一部分，民族志学者把各民族沿经典马克思主义演化的尺度排列，以五种主要生产方式为特征：原始（或原始共产主义）、奴隶、封建、资本主义和社会主义。他们把具有母系家庭制度的群体置于演化时间线的原始一端。摩梭人被视为必须被规训进现代民族规范的“活化石”，在 1960 年代末和 1970 年代初遭受官方“一夫一妻”政策的冲击：该政策拆散家庭，迫使他们进入已婚家庭单位，并管制其性与生育。[20] 经济改革以来，国内外旅行作家、记者和电影制作者传播的摩梭再现，把他们描绘成母权制、性自由的，摆脱了现代生活束缚。正如艾琳·沃尔什（Eileen Walsh）指出：“在一个讽刺性的反转中，毛主义政府试图改变的文化特征，反而成为摩梭文化独特性与价值的标志而受到颂扬。”[21]

State-sponsored primitivizing and subsequent exotic commodification of the Mosuo were the twin poles that enabled consumers of these representations, including Judy Chicago and Han Chinese artists, to project utopian visions on Luoshui.[22] After the height of Maoist social engineering passed, Mosuo communities attempted to revive suppressed cultural traditions within a context of marketization. In places like Luoshui, where the primary tourist destination is Lugu Lake, locals capitalized on outsiders' romanticization of them as a "kingdom of daughters" to develop an economy based primarily on tourism.[23] While represented as a place on the margins of contemporary life, Luoshui was incredibly cosmopolitan. The descent on the village of Lu Jie, Judy Chicago, a group of Chinese artists, and the camera crews following them represented a regular occurrence, with such interactions core to local livelihood actively influencing what it meant to be Mosuo. Walsh argues that a romanticized idea of a traditional Mosuo past, re-created for tourism, affected the local division of labor between men and women.[24] Young men imagined a past in which it was not customary for men to do farm work and explained that doing household chores would detract from the image of Mosuo women as strong and capable. Luoshui women trapped in a "myth of matriarchy" shouldered a greater burden, while also becoming the sexualized object of visitors' desires to experience "walking marriage." Tami Blumenfield emphasizes that Mosuo is a state construction, whose essentialized and mediated characteristics do not reflect the historical complexity of ethnic identity in the region.[25] Mosuo is a Chinese term; the indigenous Tibetan-Burmese term of self-identification is Na. Furthermore, members from other ethnic groups sometimes performed as Mosuo as part of the new tourist economy.

国家赞助的原始化以及随后对摩梭的异国情调商品化，构成两个相互关联的极点，使这些再现的消费者——包括朱迪·芝加哥和汉族中国艺术家——得以把乌托邦愿景投射到落水村。[22] 毛主义社会工程的高峰过去后，摩梭社区试图在市场化语境中复兴被压制的文化传统。在落水村等地，主要旅游目的地是泸沽湖，当地人利用外来者把他们浪漫化为“女儿国”的想象，发展以旅游为主的经济。[23] 落水村虽然被再现为当代生活边缘之地，却极其世界主义。卢杰、朱迪·芝加哥、一群中国艺术家以及跟随他们的摄制组降临村庄，是司空见惯的事；这类互动是当地生计的核心，积极影响着做摩梭人意味着什么。沃尔什论证，为旅游而再造的对摩梭传统过去的浪漫想象，影响了当地男女劳动分工。[24] 年轻男子想象出一个按习俗男子不做农活的过去，并解释说做家务会损害摩梭女性强壮能干的形象。被困在“母权神话”中的落水村女性承担更重负担，同时也成为游客体验“走婚”欲望的性化对象。塔米·布鲁门菲尔德（Tami Blumenfield）强调，摩梭是国家建构，其本质化、被中介的特征并不反映该地区民族认同的历史复杂性。[25] 摩梭是汉语词；当地藏缅语的自称是“纳”（Na）。此外，其他民族群体成员有时也会在新旅游经济中扮演摩梭人。

When Judy Chicago staged at Luoshui an artwork reflecting her own U.S. second-wave feminist preoccupation with an idea of essential womanhood and universal sisterhood, she privileged the local to promote a universal that then effectively erased local historical and cultural specificity. During her Beijing slide lecture, Chicago introduced the piece she created for The Long March. What If Women Ruled the World consists of prayer flags (the Mosuo practice a variant of Tibetan Buddhism), each posing a rhetorical question about how the world might be different if women ruled, paired with black and white drawings of scenes suggesting positive responses: Would god be female? Would men and women be equal? Would sexual freedom prevail? Would there be jealousy? Would there be equal parenting? Would children go hungry? Would old women be revered? Would buildings resemble wombs? Would there be private property? Would there be war? These questions in Chinese appeared on the reverse side of the flags. This piece would eventually be hung at the entrance to the Lugu Lake guesthouse where Chicago stayed. A photograph of it on The Long March website archive was captioned, "The local Mosuo people pass through the entryway with Judy Chicago's work," introducing another irony.[26] The women hired to perform a dance in the courtyard of Chicago's guesthouse were dressed as Yi, another of the twelve ethnic minority groups who live in the region but whose system of kinship organization is patrilineal.

当朱迪·芝加哥在落水村展示一件反映其美国第二波女性主义对本质化的女性身份和普遍姐妹情谊的执念的作品时，她借助地方性来推广一种普遍性，而这种普遍性随后有效抹除了地方的历史与文化特殊性。在北京幻灯片讲座中，芝加哥介绍了她为《长征》创作的作品。《如果女人统治世界》由经幡组成（摩梭人信奉藏传佛教的一个变体），每一面都提出一个关于如果女人统治世界、世界会有何不同的修辞问题，并配以暗示正面回答的黑白绘画：神会是女性吗？男女会平等吗？性自由会盛行吗？会有嫉妒吗？会平等育儿吗？孩子会挨饿吗？老年女性会受尊敬吗？建筑会像子宫吗？会有私有财产吗？会有战争吗？这些问题的中文写在经幡背面。这件作品最终挂在芝加哥所住泸沽湖客栈的入口。一张照片在《长征》网站档案中的说明写道："当地摩梭人穿过入口，经过朱迪·芝加哥的作品。"这引入了又一个讽刺。[26] 受雇在芝加哥客栈院子里表演舞蹈的女性被装扮成彝族——该地区十二个少数民族之一，但其亲属制度是父系的。

This Western feminist use of women from elsewhere to argue that patriarchy is a monolithic, cross-cultural phenomenon produces "third world difference," which in Chandra Mohanty's critique effectively appropriates and colonizes "the constitutive complexities which characterize the lives of women in these countries.[27] The twist of Judy Chicago at Lugu Lake is that she represents an interpretation of Western feminist art practice as more advanced, but through a search for primordial matriarchy presumed to still exist in China's hinterlands. Once at Lugu Lake, Lu Jie would set her up as a pedagogue to Chinese feminist artists by assigning her the task of offering a personal critique of each of their works (figure 4.03). This framework positioned Chicago as spokeswoman for what Tani Barlow calls "international U.S. feminism," the discursive formation in which U.S. women's achievement of self-enlightenment becomes a sign of their advanced progress to then be shared with the rest of the world's women.[28] Chicago proposed to educate Chinese women on how to be feminist artists by instructing them in the utopian society of the Mosuo within their own nation's borders.

这种西方女性主义利用他处女性来论证父权制是单一、跨文化现象的做法，生产出钱德拉·莫汉蒂（Chandra Mohanty）所批评的"第三世界差异"，实际上挪用并殖民了"构成这些国家女性生活特征的复杂性"。[27] 朱迪·芝加哥在泸沽湖的转折在于，她代表一种把西方女性主义艺术实践视为

更先进的解释，却通过寻找假定仍存在于中国腹地的原始母权制来实现。一到泸沽湖，卢杰就把她安排为对中国女性主义艺术家的教导者，交给她逐一评论每位艺术家作品的任务（图 4.03）。这一框架把芝加哥定位为白露（Tani Barlow）所谓“国际美国女性主义”的代言人——这一话语构型中，美国女性实现自我启蒙，成为其先进进步的标志，然后再与全世界女性分享。[28] 芝加哥提议向中国女性讲授她们本国境内的摩梭乌托邦社会，以教导她们如何成为女性主义艺术家。

This instance is one in a history of encounters between Chinese and Western feminisms. While the original plan for site six participants to discuss excerpts of Julia Kristeva's About Chinese Women was jettisoned, Kristeva serves as a cross-cultural precursor to Chicago.[29] For Lu Jie, the invocation of Kristeva provided twofold symbolic capital: she is a canonical name in Western feminist theory, who was aligned during the global 1960s with French Maoists. In the early 1970s, she traveled to China with other Tel Quel deconstructionist writers, and her text based on this experience identifies a Chinese feminine difference that helps her imagine an alternative outside to the patriarchal symbolic order she had critiqued in France. In Kristeva's psychoanalytic theorization, Western culture puts women in a double bind: if they enter the symbolic system of language, politics, time, and culture, they must identify as men, but if they inhabit the woman's body, they remain silent, outside of the symbolic order. Her concept of écriture féminine proposes a way of writing that would disrupt phallic language and lead readers to experience jouissance, a blissful break from previously held subject positions. In About Chinese Women, Kristeva suggests that Chinese women retain a premodern symbolic power that places "mother at the centre" and provides an escape from the position in which Western women find themselves;[30] furthermore, Chinese Communism liberated this archaic matriarchal order from a repressive Confucian tradition, enabling feminine jouissance.[31] If Kristeva's investment in a vision of matriarchy enabled her Maoist critique of the Western linguistic-symbolic system, Chicago's was more universalizing: patriarchy everywhere has suppressed a primordial matriarchy everywhere. She understood Mosuo matriarchy as having survived in spite of Chinese Communism. Both of these preoccupations short-circuit attention to the rich history of feminist politics in modern China. The symbolic mobilization of these Western figures to generate international interest in The Long March silences the lives and voices of women who participated in the actual Long March—activists such as Cai Chang, Chen Congying, Deng Yingchao, Kang Keqing, and Wang Quanyuan, as well as writer and thinker Ding Ling, who joined them at Yan'an. Their experience as early members of the Chinese Communist Party ranged from work and study in France and the Soviet Union to leadership in women's rights movements, from factory workers' education and organization to combat and espionage.[32]

这一实例属于中国与西方女性主义相遇史的一部分。虽然让第六站参与者讨论朱莉娅·克里斯蒂娃《中国妇女》摘录的原计划被放弃，克里斯蒂娃仍充当芝加哥的跨文化先驱。[29] 对卢杰而言，援引克里斯蒂娃提供双重象征资本：她是西方女性主义理论中的经典名字，在 1960 年代全球语境中与法国毛主义者结盟。1970 年代初，她与其他《原样》解构主义作家一起访华，基于此行的文本指认了一种中国女性的差异，帮助她想象一个她曾在法国批判的父权象征秩序之外的替代选项。在克里斯蒂娃的精神分析理论中，西方文化使女性陷入双重束缚：如果进入语言、政治、时间和文化的象征系统，她们必须认同为男性；如果居留于女人身体，她们便保持沉默，处于象征秩序之外。她的“女性书写”（écriture féminine）概念提出一种写作方式，可以扰乱阳具语言，引导读者体验极乐（jouissance）——从先前主体位置中获得极乐式的断裂。在《中国妇女》中，克里斯蒂娃提出，中国女性保留一种前现代象征权力，把“母亲置于中心”，提供一条逃离西方女性所处位置的途径；[30] 此外，中国共产主义把这一古老母权秩序从压迫性的儒家传统中解放出来，使女性极乐成为可能。[31] 如果说克里斯蒂娃对母权制愿景的投入促成了她对西方语言—象征体系的毛主义批

评，那么芝加哥的投入则更具普遍化色彩：各地父权制都压制了各地的原始母权制。她认为摩梭母权制尽管经历中国共产主义仍幸存下来。这两种执念都阻断了人们对现代中国丰富女性主义政治史的关注。为吸引国际社会关注《长征》而以象征性方式动员这些西方人物，使实际参加长征的女性——蔡畅、陈琮英、邓颖超、康克清、王泉媛等行动者，以及在延安加入她们的作家、思想家丁玲——的生活与声音沉默。她们作为中国共产党早期成员的经历，从在法国和苏联工作学习，到领导妇女权利运动，从工厂工人教育和组织，到战斗与谍报工作。[32]

While Judy Chicago's positioning in The Long March centered her as an authoritative representative of Western feminist art, this framing obscures her history. In the United States she has long fought for recognition of her work. The Feminist Art Program that she and Miriam Shapiro founded at the California Institute of the Arts in 1971 constituted an institutional critique of women's marginalization by the art system. Their first collaborative project, Womanhouse (1972), brought together twenty-eight women who transformed a deserted mansion into a site-specific art installation/happening that confronted restrictive social norms of female domesticity. Chicago's The Dinner Party, which attracted popular attention when first exhibited in 1979, incited a wide range of critics to praise and disparage it. High art theorists dismissed its use of female craft traditions and vaginal imagery as a kitschy degradation of artistic standards. In the 1980s, post-structuralist feminists critiqued Chicago's artistic manifesto for its essentialization of woman as a singular, universal category. Women of color feminists pointed out the exclusions enacted by her seating of primarily white women at the table.[33] In 1990, when the trustees of the federally supported University of the District of Columbia voted to purchase the piece for their collection, conservative members of Congress attacked The Dinner Party as obscene and pornographic, and their public outcry brought an end to these acquisition plans.

朱迪·芝加哥在《长征》中的位置把她中心化为西方女性主义艺术的权威代表，而这一框架遮蔽了她的历史。在美国，她长期为获得对其作品的承认而斗争。她与米里亚姆·夏皮罗 1971 年在加州艺术学院创立的女性主义艺术项目，构成对艺术系统边缘化女性的机构批判。她们的第一个合作项目《女人屋》（1972）召集二十八位女性，把一座废弃豪宅改造成场域特定的艺术装置 / 事件，直面限制女性家庭角色的社会规范。芝加哥的《晚宴》1979 年首次展出时引起大众关注，招致广泛批评者的赞美与贬低。高雅艺术理论家贬斥它使用女性手工艺传统和阴道意象，认为是以媚俗降低艺术标准。1980 年代，后结构主义女性主义者批评芝加哥的艺术宣言把女人本质化为单一、普遍的范畴。有色人种女性主义者指出，她的餐桌主要让白人女性就座，实施了排斥。[33] 1990 年，联邦资助的哥伦比亚特区大学董事会投票购买该作品入藏时，国会保守派议员攻击《晚宴》淫秽、色情，他们的公开抗议终止了收购计划。

A proliferation of ironies set the stage for the encounter at Lugu Lake. Judy Chicago in The Long March represented a Western center, although her position in the West vis-à-vis art world and feminist politics remained the subject of contention. Western feminists in the 1960s and 1970s, like Kristeva, looked to socialism in China as a response to patriarchy in their own societies, even as they emerged as more predominant world theoretical voices than their Chinese peers. Chinese feminists in the late twentieth and early twenty-first century attempted to decenter state-socialist feminism through a critique of how it failed them, while also rejecting the patronizing interventions of international U.S. feminism, such as those represented by Hillary Clinton in her 1995 speech on human rights at the UN Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing.[34] The Mosuo, imagined to exist at the margins of the Chinese state and modern world, serve as a cosmopolitan site for utopian reassessment of modern sexuality and gender relations, while contending with the imaginaries visited on their villages by outsiders from around the world. The historical Long March shifted its revolutionary center from east coast cities to the rural inland headquarters of Yan'an; and once the revolution was won, the peasantry remained a rhetorical center of the party, even as its leadership installed itself in the capital of Beijing. The Long March: A Walking Visual Display attempted to decenter the West as the primary location for contemporary art through a strategic return to the cultural praxis of a socialist past. The project, however, eventually fell apart before reaching Yan'an, and its main institutional outcome was a commercial gallery space in Beijing. Center-periphery relations are often theorized in colonial terms, in which power exercised in the imperial metropole pulls colonies into its orbit of control and influence, or in international economic and geopolitical terms, in which nations with the greatest wealth and power constitute a center that peripheral nations strive to displace or join. The cultural politics that emerged at Lugu Lake refute such a centripetal model. They reveal instead entangled histories, of gender produced through historical intersections with race, ethnicity, class, and nationality, in which interactions at the periphery might ignore, resist, undo, or reeducate the center.

不断增殖的反讽为泸沽湖的相遇搭建了舞台。《长征》中的朱迪·芝加哥代表西方中心，尽管她在西方相对于艺术界和女性主义政治的位置仍有争议。1960 和 1970 年代的西方女性主义者——如克里斯蒂娃——把中国的社会主义视为对本国父权制的回应，即便她们后来成为比中国同行更主导的世界理论声音。二十世纪末、二十一世纪初的中国女性主义者试图通过批判国家社会主义女性主义如何辜负她们，来使其去中心化，同时拒绝国际美国女性主义的恩赐式干预——例如希拉里·克林顿 1995 年在北京联合国第四次世界妇女大会上关于人权的演讲所代表的那种干预。[34] 摩梭人

被认为存在于中国国家和现代世界的边缘，却成为乌托邦式重新评估现代社会的性与性别关系的一个世界性场所，同时又要应对来自世界各地外来者施加于其村庄的想象。历史长征把革命中心从东海岸城市转移到内陆延安总部；革命胜利后，农民仍是党的修辞中心，即便领导层已把自己安置在首都北京。《长征：一个行走中的视觉展示》试图通过战略性地回归社会主义过去的文化实践，使西方去中心化，不再作为当代艺术的主要所在地。然而，项目最终在抵达延安前瓦解，其主要机构成果是北京的一个商业画廊空间。中心—边缘关系常以殖民主义术语理论化：帝国大都市行使权力，把殖民地拉入其控制与影响轨道；或以国际经济与地缘政治术语理论化：拥有最大财富和权力的国家构成中心，边缘国家努力取代或加入其中。泸沽湖产生的文化政治反驳了这种向心模式，反而揭示出纠缠的历史——性别通过与种族、族裔、阶级和国籍的历史交汇而生成，边缘的互动可能忽视、抵抗、瓦解或重新教育中心。

Fourteen artists, largely from the southwestern provinces of Yunnan and Sichuan but also from as far away as Inner Mongolia, eventually chose to make the trip to Lugu Lake. While those affiliated with the Sichuan Fine Arts Institute in Chongqing or the Upriver Loft studio collective in Kunming, Yunnan, belonged to pre-existing networks, the overall group represented a range of artistic commitments and generational perspectives. Their collectivity alone, assembled in a bus from Kunming to Lugu Lake, was rife with potential fault lines. They were joined by Shen Yu, the young and idealistic director of a self-initiated Chinese Women's Art Research Center in Chongqing. I traveled with them, together with my partner who came along to help with filming. Judy Chicago and her husband, photographer Donald Woodman, traveled separately to Lugu Lake, together with Lu Jie, Qiu Zhijie, their curatorial assistant Lisa Horikawa, and Megan Connolly, another participant-observer from the United States. A professional film crew accompanied them. Even before these two groups converged on the village of Luoshui, questions and tensions mixed with excitement and anticipation.

最终有十四位艺术家选择前往泸沽湖，他们大多来自西南的云南、四川，也有远自内蒙古者。其中隶属重庆四川美术学院或云南昆明上游工作室群体的人属于既有网络，但整个群体代表了不同的艺术立场和代际视角。单是这个集合在昆明开往泸沽湖大巴上的集体，内部就潜藏着重重裂痕。与他们同行的还有沈宇（Shen Yu），一位年轻而理想主义的重庆自办中国女性艺术研究中心主任。我和他们一起旅行，我的伴侣同行帮助拍摄。朱迪·芝加哥和丈夫、摄影师唐纳德·伍德曼（Donald Woodman）另行前往泸沽湖，同行的有卢杰、邱志杰、策展助理 Lisa Horikawa，以及另一位来自美国的参与观察者梅根·康诺利（Megan Connolly）。一支专业摄制组跟着他们。甚至在两批人汇聚落水村之前，问题与紧张已夹杂着兴奋和期待。

On the bus from Kunming to Lijiang, the first leg of the trip, artists Fu Liya and Wu Weihe discussed what they understood of Chicago's proposed piece. When Fu said she'd heard it would be an installation of the one hundred art proposals Chicago had received from Chinese women, Wu responded that this sounded like a plan for an impressive conceptual artwork that unfairly relied on their efforts, while also detracting from their individual ideas. They guessed at the thinking behind Lu Jie's decision to invite Judy Chicago. If he organized a Long March but didn't include any women, it would be deemed backward instead of attracting international attention. Inviting someone famous like Judy Chicago would inspire a lot of female artists to participate. Wu couldn't help but continue to ask, "But this exhibit is about China's Long March, why did he invite a Western feminist?"

在从昆明到丽江的第一段大巴上，艺术家付丽雅和 Wu Weihe 讨论各自对芝加哥拟议作品的理解。付丽雅说，她听说那会是芝加哥从中国女性那里收到的一百份艺术方案的装置；Wu Weihe 回应说，这听起来像一件令人印象深刻的概念艺术计划，却不公平地依赖她们的劳动，同时也削弱了她们的个人想法。她们猜测卢杰决定邀请朱迪·芝加哥背后的考虑。如果他组织长征却没有任何女性，就会被视为落后，而不是吸引国际关注。邀请朱迪·芝加哥这样著名的人，会激励许多女性艺术家参与。Wu Weihe 忍不住继续问："可这个展览是关于中国长征的，他为什么邀请一个西方女性主义者？"

"Beautiful Lugu Lake—Mysterious Land of Daughters" read the tickets we purchased at the entrance to the Lugu Lake Nature Preserve after a second day of travel from Lijiang on narrow roads, switching back and forth through spectacular mountainous terrain. As the bus dodged rocks from recent landslides, heated discussion about the exhibition's organization continued. Upon arriving in Luoshui, a line of hewn-log and tile-roof guesthouses and restaurants along the lakefront, the artists began scouting out locations for performance and installation pieces and making connections with locals whose cooperation they sought.

从丽江出发，在狭窄道路上又走了一天，在壮丽山区间盘旋之后，我们在泸沽湖自然保护区入口买到的门票上印着"美丽的泸沽湖——神秘的女儿国"。大巴躲避着近期山体滑坡留下的石块，关于展览组织的热烈讨论仍在继续。抵达落水村——湖畔一列木刻楞和瓦顶客栈、餐馆——后，艺术家们开始寻找行为和装置作品的地点，并与他们寻求合作的当地人建立联系。

That evening, the first group meeting between Judy Chicago and all of the participating artists took place in a Luoshui restaurant. The electricity had gone out, and as dusk dimmed the lakefront windows, white candle stubs lit the room. Color posters, their gloss weathered, of scenic landscapes, flower arrangements, European-style table settings, and pop stars, hung on the whitewashed walls. Through a translator, Chicago asked the artists to sit in a circle, which they did awkwardly around the perimeter of several round tables that had been pushed together. After they had introduced themselves, Chicago stood and presented her idea of how they might work together. Lisa Horikawa provided interpretation, with Lu Jie occasionally jumping in to clarify a point. Chicago began, “Thirty years ago, in the United States, I did a project with a number of women called Womanhouse. Some of you have heard of it. Have any of you heard of it? Yes. Ok! Some of you’ve heard of it, right? Well, it became very famous. Since I did that, other women have done Womanhouses all over the world.” She then described the inn where she was staying, separate from the artists’ lodging and some distance from the village, as so beautiful that she and Lu Jie had decided to spend their own money to rent out the entire place. She suggested that they all hang or stage their works there, following the model of the Womanhouse installation she, Miriam Schapiro, and their students had created in 1972. She implied that the location provided safety to exhibit without the interference of local officials, a concern passed on to her by Lu Jie, who had heard of official concern about his activity in Lijiang. When she asked those assembled for their opinion, the room fell silent. Eventually a few artists explained they had already chosen spots for their pieces and would have to assess the layout of her guesthouse before they could decide.

那天晚上，朱迪·芝加哥与所有参与艺术家的第一次小组会议在落水村一家餐馆举行。停电了，暮色使湖畔窗户暗淡下来，白色蜡烛头照亮房间。白墙上挂着风景、插花、欧式餐桌布置和流行歌星的彩色海报，光泽已被风化。通过翻译，芝加哥请艺术家们围坐成一圈；他们别扭地围坐在几张拼在一起的圆桌旁。自我介绍后，芝加哥站起来，讲述她关于大家如何合作的想法。Lisa Horikawa 担任口译，卢杰不时插话澄清。芝加哥开始说：“三十年前，在美国，我和一些女性做了一个叫《女人屋》的项目。你们有些人听说过。你们有人听说过吗？有。好！你们有些人听说过，对吧？嗯，它后来变得非常有名。自从我做了那个项目，世界各地的其他女性也做过《女人屋》。”随后她描述自己住的客栈——与艺术家住处分开，离村庄有些距离——美得让她和卢杰决定自掏腰包租下整座院落。她建议大家都在那里悬挂或展演作品，仿照她、米里亚姆·夏皮罗和学生们 1972 年创作的《女人屋》装置模式。她暗示，这个地点提供了安全，可以在没有地方官员干预的情况下展出——这是卢杰转达给她的担忧，他听说官方在丽江对他的活动有所关注。当她问在场者意见时，房间一片沉默。最后几位艺术家解释说，她们已为作品选好地点，需要先看过她客栈的布局才能决定。

Chicago departed after they agreed to meet the next morning at the site of her proposed Womanhouse. The Chinese artists continued with their activities, with discussions going into the early morning. One group rushed to meet the new village chief, with whom they had arranged a tentative appointment. They needed local participants for their performances and spent hours around a fire explaining to him the relation of their pieces to local culture. The chief, in turn, explained for them in practiced detail the workings of Mosuo family structure. This earnest man in a cowboy hat was the one to describe for the outsiders their system of matrilineal descent; and it was he, not a woman, who could grant them the help they needed, but only after he returned from a trip to help dig a well and repair a road.

他们同意第二天早晨在芝加哥提议的“女人屋”地点见面，随后芝加哥离开。中国艺术家继续活动，讨论持续到凌晨。一群人赶去会见新村长，他们先前与他约了暂定会面。他们需要当地人参与行为作品，于是在火堆旁花了几个小时向他解释作品与当地文化的关系。村长则以熟练的细节向他们说明摩梭家庭结构的运作。这位戴着牛仔帽的诚恳男子向外来者描述他们的母系继嗣制度；也是他，而不是某位女性，能够给予他们需要的帮助——但前提是他先去帮忙挖井修路的行程结束。

Around midnight, most of the artists crowded into a room at their guesthouse and debated the pros and cons of accepting Chicago's proposal. Objections were raised about a framework associated with a different feminist time and place—the 1970s in the United States, rather than one developed out of a Chinese historical context. Many expressed concern over whether the final project would be attributed to Chicago alone—the main problem many had with The Dinner Party—with the names of her Chinese collaborators erased.[35] While some advocated for splitting from The Long March organization to proceed on their own, they reached a compromise the next morning in the form of their manifesto. As they worked on the wording, Fu Liya asserted, "Give us something unambiguous. If, in the end, it's 'Womanhouse,' a piece by Judy Chicago and twenty Chinese female artists, we're screwed, that's absolutely not allowed! Authorship rights wanted!" The short text, which I translated into English, listed four demands:

午夜前后，大多数艺术家挤进客栈的一个房间，辩论接受芝加哥提议的利弊。有人反对这一框架，因为它关联着另一个女性主义时空——1970 年代的美国，而不是从中国的历史语境中发展出来的。许多人担心最终项目是否会只归功于芝加哥一个人——这也是他们对《晚宴》的主要意见——而中国合作者的名字被抹去。[35] 一些人主张脱离《长征》组织自行行动，第二天早晨他们以宣言形式达成妥协。在推敲措辞时，付丽雅断言：“给我们一个明确的东西。如果最后是‘《女人屋》，朱迪·芝加哥与二十位中国女性艺术家合作作品’，我们就完了，绝对不允许！我们要求著作权！”这篇由我译成英文的短文列出四项要求：

> 1 Chinese women artists wish to replace the concept of "Womanhouse" with the title "Dialogue with Lugu Lake" or "Dialogue with Judy Chicago at Lugu Lake."
> 2 All participants in the entire Lugu Lake art activity assert the moral and legal rights to works in their own names.
>
> 3 Each artist/participant will maintain the copyright to her own work.
>
> 4 The artists wish to have a clearly defined written agreement. The contents of the agreement will be agreed on by both sides, with signatures constituting a binding contract.

1 中国女性艺术家希望以“与泸沽湖对话”或“在泸沽湖与朱迪•芝加哥对话”的标题，取代“女人屋”概念。

2 整个泸沽湖艺术活动的所有参与者主张以其本人名义享有作品的道德与法律权利。

3 每位艺术家 / 参与者保留自己作品的著作权。

4 艺术家希望有一份明确界定的书面协议。协议内容由双方商定，签字构成有约束力的合同。

Although some of the artists chose to abstain, a majority signed this terse and circumspect document, couched in the language of international copyright law and individual possession. This instance of “saying no” took place less than one year after China’s official entry to the wto, at a time when Western critics bashed China as a pirate nation whose acts of copying marked them as culturally inferior.

虽然一些艺术家选择弃权，多数人签署了这份简短而谨慎的文件；它用国际著作权法与个人占有的语言写成。这一“说不”事件发生在中国正式加入世贸组织不到一年后——当时西方批评者抨击中国是盗版国家，其仿制行为表明文化低劣。

When the artists arrived that rainy morning at Chicago’s guesthouse, Lu Jie announced that she lay sick in bed on the second floor and would not be able to meet with them, so they presented their signed list of demands to Lu Jie. Several artists added to the critique what they saw as the hierarchical presentation of the “proposals exhibit,” hung earlier that morning under the direction of Lu and Qiu. Chicago’s What If Women Ruled the World prayer flags flew from the guesthouse entranceway, whereas the Chinese artists’ proposals were displayed on the walls of the courtyard inside. Lu took their manifesto and comments upstairs to Chicago’s room. As they waited, Lei Yan mused, “Even though we are in the Lugu Lake area, we have no discursive power.” Sun Guojuan responded, “Right, we were inserted into someone else’s work. Moreover, before that, we didn’t even discuss this, I mean, nobody told us there would be a Womanhouse, we didn’t know until yesterday. That’s to say, when we enter into Womanhouse, it’s someone else’s, we become someone else’s work.”

当艺术家们在那个雨晨抵达芝加哥的客栈时，卢杰宣布她病倒在二楼床上，无法会见他们，于是他们向卢杰呈交签名的要求清单。几位艺术家还在批评中补充了她们眼中“方案展”的等级化展示——当天早晨早些时候在卢杰和邱志杰指导下挂起。芝加哥的《如果女人统治世界》经幡从客栈入口飘扬，而中国艺术家的方案则展示在院内院墙上。卢杰把他们的宣言和意见带上楼，走进芝加哥的房间。等待时，雷燕沉思道：“即使我们身在泸沽湖地区，我们也没有话语权。”孙国娟回应：“对，我们被插入别人的作品。而且在此之前，我们甚至没有讨论过这件事，我是说，没人告诉我们会有个‘女人屋’，我们直到昨天才知道。也就是说，当我们进入‘女人屋’时，它已经是别人的了，我们成了别人的作品。”

Lu Jie returned to report that although upset, Chicago had agreed to all four of their points. Rather than taking her concession as a victory, they continued to debate the differences that had brought them to a head. Anger mixed with remorse, exhaustion, and cigarette smoke. Lu lectured the artists about his responsibilities as a curator to their foreign guest and thanked them in a strained tone for their efforts. A primary complaint to emerge from the artists’ side was that they hadn’t had enough time with Chicago to communicate their ideas, let alone come to a consensus about an overall plan. Lu again went upstairs to update Chicago, and this time she emerged and was helped downstairs, to uncertain applause from her audience. She sat with the artists and through Horikawa tearfully described how hurt she felt by their criticism: “I wanted to try to offer my strength to serve their art. And it hurts me that they seem to have taken that in the wrong spirit.... I came here to make art. I don’t want to talk forever. We don’t have that much time. I came to make art.”[36] While she interpreted their manifesto as hurtful criticism impeding their ability to make art, the manifesto itself could also be understood as a work of situational art, already months in the conceptualization, the final form of which emerged from hours of intense discussion at Lugu Lake.

卢杰回来报告说，芝加哥虽感不快，但同意了他们的全部四点要求。然而，他们没有把她的让步当作胜利，而是继续辩论那些导致双方冲突激化的分歧。愤怒混合着悔意、疲惫和香烟烟雾。卢杰向艺术家们讲述自己作为策展人对远方客人的责任，并用勉强的语气感谢他们的努力。艺术家一方提出的主要抱怨是，他们没有足够时间与芝加哥交流想法，更不用说就总体方案达成共识。卢杰再次上楼向芝加哥更新情况；这一次，她出来了，被人扶下楼，迎来听众不确定的掌声。她与艺术家们坐在一起，通过 Horikawa 含泪描述他们的批评让她多么受伤：“ 我想试着贡献自己的力量来服务她们的艺术。而她们似乎误解了我的这番心意，这让我很伤心……我来这里是为了创作艺术。我不想永远谈下去。我们没有那么多时间。我是来创作艺术的。”[36] 她把他们的宣言理解为伤人的批评，认为这妨碍了大家进行艺术创作；而宣言本身也可以被理解为一件情境艺术作品——它已经构思数月，最终形式则从泸沽湖数小时激烈讨论中产生。

Over the next two days, several artists displayed photographs, paintings, and installations at Chicago’s inn. Due to its remove from nearby village and tourist activity, the audience for these pieces consisted of artists, camera crews, and guesthouse employees. Other artists who required local participation or different environmental settings staged their pieces in the village or on its southern lakeshore. They attracted slightly more varied audiences. Judy Chicago continued, as planned, to do a critique of each Chinese artist’s work. These conversations, although asymmetrical in their presumption of a student-teacher relationship, involved at least a focused, two-way discussion of individual pieces.

The Politics of Site Specificity

The artworks exhibited as a result of these collective activities explored the limits of site-specific art practice, while fissures between what the site meant to various participants challenged monolithic understandings of what is feminist or what is Chinese. For Judy Chicago, Lugu Lake represented, in part, the internationalization of Womanhouse, a feminist instance of site-specific art fundamental to her own history as an artist. The dilapidated mansion that she, Miriam Shapiro, and their Feminist Art Program students chose for Womanhouse provided a physical space for exploring gendered norms in terms of domesticity. The difference between a bourgeois urban home and a rural guesthouse built as tourist lodging seemed lost in translation. For the Chinese artists who refused to "be inserted into someone else's work," the site specificity of this 1970s U.S. feminist project, and its white, middle-class preoccupations did not translate to Lugu Lake or their own experiences in a socialist society that since the 1950s had actively mobilized women as part of the public labor force. The extent of this gap became apparent in the multiplicity of their responses to the siting of The Long March at Lugu Lake.

这些集体活动展出的作品探索了场域特定艺术实践的限度，而地点对不同参与者的意义之间的裂隙，也挑战了对何谓女性主义、何谓中国的单一理解。对朱迪·芝加哥而言，泸沽湖部分意味着《女人屋》的国际化——一个场域特定艺术的女性主义实例，对她自己的艺术家历史至关重要。她、米里亚姆·夏皮罗和女性主义艺术项目的学生为《女人屋》选择的破败豪宅，提供了一个物理空间，用以探索家庭性方面的性别规范。资产阶级城市住宅与作为旅游住宿建造的乡村客栈之间的差异，似乎在翻译中丢失了。对于那些拒绝“被插入别人的作品”的中国艺术家而言，这一 1970 年代美国女性主义项目的场域特定性及其白人、中产阶级关切，无法翻译到泸沽湖，也无法翻译到她们自己在 1950 年代以来积极动员女性参与公共劳动力的社会主义社会中的经验。这一鸿沟的程度，在她们对《长征》落户泸沽湖的多样回应中变得明显。

Site specificity as a form of anti-institutional art praxis located outside of the museum/gallery system has developed since the late 1960s in different directions. Key paradigms have explored a site's physical, materialist characteristics; the ideological network of social spaces and economies that structure it; and the public concerns, such as community identity and politics, that extend it beyond an art context.[37] These experiments broke down borders governing artistic production and reception, even as museums and galleries simultaneously attempted to embrace site-specific art. Lu Jie's The Long March is positioned precisely at the crux of this conundrum. His orchestration of artistic explorations of various sites along the historical Long March route moved art out of metropolitan museum and gallery spaces, but was also meant to attract international institutional attention, which it did. Documentary photographs and video, exhibited alongside Lu's curatorial précis, were included in Art and China's Revolution (2008–9) at the Asia Society in New York. While the The Long March in New York presents an opportunity for resiting Chinese revolutionary art and politics as important world historical events, it also smooths over the complexity of how artists engaged the original site of creation. Their pieces respond to the physical terrain of Lugu Lake, imaginaries of alternative Mosuo sociality, the growing influence of tourism on ethnic minority groups, Chinese socialist image making practices, and even the institutional power of Judy Chicago.

场域特定性作为一种位于博物馆 / 画廊系统之外的反机构艺术实践，自 1960 年代末以来沿不同方向发展。关键范式探索地点的物理、物质特征；结构它的社会空间与经济体的意识形态网络；以及把场域延伸到艺术语境之外的公共关切，如社区认同和政治。[37] 这些实验打破了支配艺术生产与接受的边界，即便博物馆和画廊同时试图拥抱场域特定艺术。卢杰的《长征》正处在这一难题的症结上。他对沿历史长征路线各地点艺术探索的组织，把艺术移出大都市博物馆和画廊空间，但也意在吸引国际机构关注——它确实做到了。纪实照片和录像与卢杰的策展说明一起，被纳入纽约亚洲协会的《艺术与中国革命》（2008—9）。虽然纽约的《长征》为把中国革命艺术与政治重新定位为重要的世界历史事件提供了机会，它也抹平了艺术家如何介入原始创作地点的复杂性。他们的作品回应泸沽湖的物理地形、对另类摩梭社会性的想象、旅游业对少数民族群体日益增长的影响、中国社会主义图像制作实践，甚至朱迪 • 芝加哥的机构权力。

Li Shurui, a student in 2002 in the painting department at the Sichuan Academy of Fine Art, described her decision to join The Long March as accidental and her contribution to the exhibit as outside the theme proposed by Judy Chicago. She and two classmates, among the youngest participants in the project, maintained the most distance from the tensions brewing between artists, Lu, and Chicago. Li's installation, Seeing Mountains, Seeing Water, consisted of twenty box-shaped tents fashioned out of mosquito netting and bamboo poles. She staked them in the lake in an arc echoing the shoreline (plate 10). This minimalist tracing of Lugu Lake's geographic contour places the white cube of gallery display within the landscape, a mark of artistic intervention on the environment. The juxtaposition of the tents with the mountainous backdrop also references the Chinese literati tradition of painting, in which an amateur artist wandered through a landscape, committing the journey to memory, before returning to a small studio or pavilion to paint it. Li spoke of the interior space demarcated by each tent and her feeling that the walls, while porous, framed the water in a way that differentiated inside from outside. As water lapped through the airy spaces, she also noted that they create a sense of voyeurism, of being compelled to peer inside, just as tourists to Lugu Lake desire an inner glance at the Mosuo system of sexual relations.

李姝睿是 2002 年四川美术学院绘画系的学生，她把加入《长征》的决定描述为偶然，把自己的参展贡献描述为偏离芝加哥提议的主题。她和两位同学属于项目中最年轻的一批参与者，与艺术家、卢杰和芝加哥之间酝酿的紧张保持最大距离。李姝睿的装置《看山看水》由二十顶用蚊帐布和竹竿制成的箱形帐篷组成。她把它们插在湖中，排成与岸线呼应的弧线（图版 10）。这种对泸沽湖地理轮廓的极简描摹，把画廊展示的白色立方体置于风景之中，成为艺术介入环境的一个标记。帐篷与群山背景的并置也指涉中国文人绘画传统：业余艺术家漫游山水，把旅程铭记于心，然后回到小画室或亭中作画。李姝睿谈到每顶帐篷划出的内部空间，以及她觉得四壁虽通透，却把水面框定，区分内外。当水波拍过通风的空间时，她指出，它们还制造出一种窥视感，一种被迫向里张望的感觉，正如来泸沽湖的游客渴望窥见摩梭性关系制度的内里。

The site-specific investigations of Lei Yan focused on the gendered history of the Long March. As with the "seeding machine" symbolism she and Sun Guojuan explored as preparation for their participation, Lei drew on her experience in the military, a socialist institution that championed female soldiers' mobilization even while continuing to treat them as different from and less than male counterparts. Her deployment of historical photographs of male and female Long March comrades probes the internal power dynamics of the original historical event, as well as the art experiment under the same name to follow sixty years later. She responded to Chicago's "what if" fantasy with a pair of digitally altered black-and-white photographs asking linked, retrospective questions: What If the Long March Had Been a Women's Rights Movement? (figure 4.04) and What If They Had Been Women? (figure 4.05). She shifts the subjunctive mood of Chicago's verbal construction to the past unreal conditional, which roots dreams for future justice in historically, culturally specific conditions. The first photograph features prominent female activists, including Cai Chang, Deng Yingchao, and Kang Keqing, who joined the Red Army on its 1934 trek. The second photograph features male party leaders, Mao at the center, standing on the same patch of ground, adorned with 1930s female hairstyles. In each photo a regiment of female soldiers marches in the background, but in opposite directions, as if toward the future, as if toward the past. Lei intended for the photographs to be hung side by side, stereoscopic images that don't quite match up. The same miniature, camouflage-dressed figure of the artist herself, peering through binoculars at her historical predecessors, appears in the bottom right corner of each. Lei Yan proposed hanging her photographs on two large windows facing the courtyard of the guesthouse where Chicago was staying. Lu Jie worried her Mao Zedong in drag might attract official criticism of the overall exhibit, so the images were hung back-to-back, with the one of male leaders facing inward. This decision, which Lu himself reflected on as a form of self-censorship, provided one response to Lei's questions: while it is a fait accompli for socialism to garb women in the image of men as part of its politics of liberatory revolution, the reverse remains dangerous and hidden.

雷燕的场域特定考察聚焦长征的性别化历史。正如她和孙国娟为参与而准备的“播种机”象征，雷燕动用了自己在军队的经历——一个倡导动员女兵、却仍把她们视为不同于并低于男性同行的社会主义机构。她使用男女长征同志的历史照片，探查原始历史事件内部的权力动态，以及六十年后同名艺术实验中的权力动态。她用一对数字修改的黑白照片回应芝加哥的“如果”幻想，提出相互关联的回顾性问题：《如果长征是一场女权运动?》（图 4.04）和《如果他们是女人?》（图 4.05）。她把芝加哥口头构念中的虚拟语气转为过去非真实条件句，把对未来正义的梦想扎根于历史、文化特定的条件。第一张照片中有蔡畅、邓颖超、康克清等著名女性行动者，她们随红军参加了 1934 年开始的长征。第二张照片中是男性党的领导人们，毛泽东居于中央，站在同一片土地上，却被配上 1930 年代女性发型。每张照片背景中都有一队女兵行军，但方向相反，仿佛走向未来，仿佛走向过去。雷燕原计划把两张照片并排悬挂，成为不太对得上的立体图像。右下角都有同一个身着迷彩的艺术家本人微小人像，正用双筒望远镜审视她的历史前辈。雷燕提议把照片挂在两扇朝向芝加哥所住客栈院子的大窗上。卢杰担心她那张男扮女装的毛泽东可能招致官方对整个展览的批评，于是照片被背对背悬挂，男性领导人那张朝内。卢杰自己反思这一决定是一种自我审查，它回应了雷燕的问题：社会主义作为解放革命政治的一部分，让女性穿上男性形象的外衣，这已是既成事实；而反向操作仍然危险且被隐藏。

Sun Guojuan's installation piece, also displayed at Chicago's guesthouse, explored the dynamics of tourism in Luoshui. In Stuck to You, Sun continued her use of sugar, a material integral to her photographic series Sweetness Forever, which paired nude images of the artist's body covered in sugar with still-life arrangements of similarly coated beauty products. Sun extended her depiction of the saccharine surface of market reform from the realm of femininity to touristic consumption of ethnic difference. She staged her installation in a room with a traditional Mosuo hearth, with stools for female family members on the right and male family members on the left. On the walls she hung photographs and explanatory passages about Mosuo culture collected from tourist publications. On the floor, she scattered chunks of sticky candy and strips of paper printed with Mosuo lineage names. As people walked through the room, candy and paper stuck to the bottom of their shoes, and they had to scrap off the sticky mess upon exiting. Stuck to You implicated tourists seeking escape and titillation in the process of social disruption they leave behind.

孙国娟的装置作品也在芝加哥客栈展出，探索落水村旅游业的动态。在《粘住你》中，孙国娟延续对糖的使用——这一材料对她摄影系列《永远甜蜜》至关重要；该系列把艺术家身体覆满糖的裸体图像，与同样裹糖的美容产品静物摆置并置。孙国娟把对市场改革甜腻表面的描绘，从女性气质领域延伸到对民族差异的旅游消费。她把装置布置在一个有传统摩梭火塘的房间，右侧是女性家庭成员坐凳，左侧是男性家庭成员坐凳。墙上挂着她从旅游出版物收集的摩梭文化照片和说明段落。地上散落粘性糖果块，以及印有摩梭世系名的纸条。人们走过房间时，糖果和纸粘在鞋底，出去时必须刮掉粘腻的杂物。《粘住你》把寻求逃避和刺激的游客，卷入他们留下的社会混乱过程。

Huang Ru, Li Shurui's classmate at the Sichuan Academy of Fine Art, focused like Lei Yan on gender in socialist visual culture, through an exploration of the ccp tradition of open-air cinema (lutian dianying). The party employed cinema as a form of political consciousness-raising, through development of state-directed production studios and circulation of films to rural populations. Mobile open-air cinemas, with a screen and projector temporarily set up in villages, projected images of the new nation throughout the countryside. For Open-Air Cinema, Huang Ru arranged for old thirty-five-millimeter prints of classic Chinese movies, all featuring women in lead roles, to be projected in the courtyard of a Luoshui guesthouse. She explained that as a member of the generation born toward the end of high socialism, the piece involved learning how to navigate the official institutional channels necessary to rent the projector, screen, speakers, and film prints. Of all the pieces created at Lugu Lake, Huang's drew the largest audience in spite of rainy weather. Local villagers, including those in costume who had wandered over from their evening performance at the Mosuo Cultural Museum, mingled together with Chinese and foreign tourists under umbrellas and roof eaves as they watched films such as Sister Jiang. This 1978 film adaptation of an opera popularized in the 1960s tells the story of an underground Communist who in 1948 struggles valiantly against the Guomindang.[38] On the way to deliver an important directive to troops in northern Sichuan, Sister Jiang learns her husband has been killed and joins the peasant commander Double-Gun Grandma as leader of the guerrilla forces. When a traitor betrays her, Guomindang officers imprison Sister Jiang on the site of the former Sino-American Cooperative Association (saco). Before her execution on the eve of Chongqing's liberation, she sings a climatic number "I Sacrifice My Youth for Communism" amid chains and torture instruments.[39] Huang's Open-Air Cinema not only presents a popular 1970s female image radically different from that assumed by the original Womanhouse artists, but also raises questions about the rural-urban traffic of images in China especially relevant in Lugu Lake, a community repeatedly imaged by outsiders in various myth-making projects.

黄茹是李姝睿在四川美术学院的同班同学，她像雷燕一样聚焦社会主义视觉文化中的性别，探讨中共的露天电影传统。党把电影用作政治觉悟提升的形式，发展国家指导的制片厂，并把影片发行到农村人口中。流动露天电影院在村庄临时架起幕布和放映机，把新国家的形象投射到乡间各地。为创作《露天电影》，黄茹安排在落水村一家客栈的院子里放映中国经典影片的旧 35 毫米拷贝，这些影片都以女性为主角。她解释说，作为出生于高度社会主义末期的一代，这件作品涉及学习如何打通租用放映机、幕布、扬声器和胶片拷贝所需的官方机构渠道。在泸沽湖创作的所有作品中，黄茹的作品尽管遇雨，仍吸引了最多观众。当地村民，包括身着演出服、从摩梭文化博物馆晚间演出走过来的人，与中外游客一起打着伞、站在屋檐下，观看《江姐》等影片。这部 1978 年根据 1960 年代流行歌剧改编的电影，讲述一名地下党员 1948 年英勇对抗国民党的故事。[38] 在前往川北向部队传达重要指示途中，江姐得知丈夫遇害，加入农民司令双枪老太婆，成为游击队领导人。叛徒出卖她后，国民党军官把她关押在旧中美合作所（SACO）所在地。在重庆解放前夕被处决前，她在镣铐和刑具中唱出高潮唱段《我为共产主义把青春贡献》。[39] 黄茹的《露天电影》不仅呈现了与原始《女人屋》艺术家所设想截然不同的 1970 年代流行女性形象，也提出关于中国城乡图像流通的问题；这在泸沽湖尤为重要——这是一个不断被外来者以各种神话制造项目拍摄的社区。

In their interpretation of the Lugu Lake site, Su Ruya and Song Yanping embraced the romanticized portrait of Mosuo sexual emancipation highlighted in representations by outsiders. Both staged critical reflections on the Han nation-state, and its disciplining of citizens' sexual relations through marriage and reproduction, on the ground of an imagined Mosuo cultural landscape of free love. For Goddess Mountain—Eternal Woman (plate 11), Su Ruya stood at the edge of the lake in a wind-billowed, flowered nightgown and flung roses—the imported, cosmopolitan symbol of romantic love—into the water: an offering to Gamu Mountain, central in local iconography as protective site for the Mosuo mother goddess. Su described herself as an eternal bride devoted to the dream of unfettered passion, the open boat in which a lover could ply his charms but never possess her. In contrast with this romantic oblation, Song Yanping's nearby installation Fire Extinguisher (figure 4.06) presented a stark triangular arrangement of tripods made of tree branches stuck into the gravely beach. They resembled rudimentary domestic structures. From the center of each tripod hung a frilly white cloth bag, symbolizing the promise of marital happiness, filled with either rice or sand. She lit a fire beneath each, but the wind and lack of sufficient kindling kept the flames from reaching the bottom of each bag, as Song had intended. Instead, she poked a hole in the cloth, so that the contents of the womb-shaped bags steadily poured out and extinguished the flames beneath: a process of depletion dramatically staged against the alternative "nature" of Lugu Lake. The empty bags swung limply in the wind. In these artworks, Chinese women used a cosmopolitan art activity to revision the Chinese nation-state, but in the process Mosuo women became the silenced ground for their reconfiguration of gendered subject-object relations.[40]

在诠释泸沽湖地点时，苏茹娅和宋雁萍拥抱了外来者再现中突出强调的摩梭性解放浪漫形象。两人都以想象的摩梭自由恋爱文化景观为场地，对汉族国家及其通过婚姻与生育规训公民性关系展

开批判性反思。为《女神山——永恒的女人》（图版 11），苏茹娅站在湖边，身穿被风吹起的碎花睡裙，把玫瑰——进口的、世界性的浪漫爱情象征——抛入水中：献给格姆女神山，它在地方图像学中是摩梭母神保护圣地的核心。苏茹娅把自己描述为永恒的新娘，献身于无拘激情的梦想；那是敞开的船，爱人可以施展魅力，却永远无法占有她。与这种浪漫奉献相对，宋雁萍附近的装置《灭火器》（图 4.06）呈现树杈三脚架插在砾石滩上的鲜明三角排列。它们像简陋的家庭结构。每个三脚架中央挂着一只镶褶边的白布袋，象征婚姻幸福的承诺，里面装满米或沙。她在每个袋子下点火，但风大、引火物不足，火焰未能像她预期的那样烧到袋底。于是她在布上戳洞，让子宫形状袋中的东西不断漏出，浇灭下方火焰：一个消耗过程，在泸沽湖另类“自然”的背景下戏剧性上演。空袋在风中无力摇摆。在这些作品中，中国女性用世界主义的艺术活动重新想象中国民族国家，但在这一过程中，摩梭女性成为她们重构性别主客体关系的沉默基底。[40]

Zhang Lun's Lugu Lake—Happy Existence (plates 12 and 13) represents a multilayered approach to its site, which takes on the institutions of tourism, sociological research, ethnic classification, and Judy Chicago herself. It is part of a larger imagined series documenting the impact of China's economic reforms on personal circumstances and desires. In locations around the country, including shopping malls and automobile showrooms, Zhang would ask individuals to fill out short surveys with information such as age, gender, hero, and personal aspirations, to accompany photographs taken on-site.[41] In Luoshui, Zhang staged her piece at the Mosuo Cultural Museum. In order to raise revenue to build and maintain museum exhibits, its founders encouraged commercial activity, and each evening a ticketed performance took place in its central courtyard, with tourists joining a song-and-dance circle led by Luoshui residents dressed in Mosuo costume. Zhang transformed the display of a Mosuo family hearth into a photography studio. She covered the walls with a pink-toned print of one of her oil-painted flower photographs and affixed a Lugu Lake tourist map to the center of the back wall. This backdrop accentuated the artificial representation of Mosuo life consumed by tourists. With the aid of the village chief, Zhang arranged for fifty villagers to take turns being photographed with Judy Chicago, turning the tables by making her into the tourist attraction. One by one, they stepped out of the performance in the courtyard to fill out a survey and be photographed with the visiting feminist dignitary. The survey adapted for Lugu Lake asked if participants had heard of the "feminist master Judy Chicago" and if they thought the Mosuo should be recognized as an independent ethnic nationality; most answered "no" to the first and "yes" to the second. Zhang requested that Chicago, who had hesitantly agreed to participate, sit in the place reserved for female elders and pour tea for each Mosuo person as they entered and sat down. The first person to pose with Chicago was the Luoshui village chief. After the twelfth cup of tea, Chicago appeared fed up with her role in the piece. She exclaimed, "No one in America would believe I'd poured tea for anyone!" and left the scene. In an angry outburst of her own, Zhang Lun raged over the music from the courtyard about Chicago's intransigence, which had disrupted her plans. Suddenly her face lit up, and she declared, "The Mosuo will pour tea for the Mosuo!" She continued taking photos as each following Mosuo person poured a cup of tea for him or herself.

张伦的《泸沽湖——快乐的存在》（图版 12、13）代表一种多层次的地点处理方法，向旅游、社会学研究、民族分类等制度以及朱迪·芝加哥本人发起挑战。它属于一个更大的想象系列，记录中国经济改革对个人处境与欲望的影响。在全国各地，包括购物中心和汽车展厅，张伦请个人填写简短问卷，内容如年龄、性别、英雄、个人愿望，与现场拍摄的照片相配。[41] 在落水村，张伦把作品设在摩梭文化博物馆。为筹集建造和维护展览的收入，创办者鼓励商业活动，每晚在中央庭院举行售票演出，游客加入由身着摩梭服装的落水村民带领的歌舞圈。张伦把摩梭家庭火塘的展示转变成摄影棚。墙上覆着一张粉色调的油画花卉照片印刷品，后墙中央贴着泸沽湖旅游地图。这一背景强化了游客所消费的摩梭生活的虚假再现。在村长帮助下，张伦安排五十位村民轮流与朱迪·芝加哥合影，反客为主，使她成为旅游景点。他们一个接一个从庭院演出中走出来，填写问卷，与来访的女性主义贵宾合影。为泸沽湖改编的问卷询问参与者是否听说过“女性主义大师朱迪·芝加哥”，以及是否认为摩梭应被承认为独立民族；多数人对第一个问题答“不”，对第二个答“是”。芝加哥此前已犹豫地同意参与。张伦请她坐在为女性长者保留的位置上，为每位走进来坐下的摩梭人倒茶。第一个与芝加哥合影的是落水村村长。倒到第十二杯茶时，芝加哥似乎厌倦了自己在这件作品中的角色。她喊道：“美国没人会相信我给任何人倒过茶！”然后离开了场景。张伦也愤怒爆发，在庭院音乐声中怒斥芝加哥的不妥协打乱了她的计划。突然，她脸上一亮，宣布：“摩梭人给摩梭人倒茶！”她继续拍照，随后每位摩梭人给自己倒了一杯茶。

This moment of breakdown, marked by the disappearance of Chicago in Zhang's images, is indicative of the "dialogue" that occurred at Lugu Lake. Just as some of the artists, including Chicago, used imaginaries of the Mosuo as the basis for their participation in art world, feminist, and nation-state debates, Zhang used Judy Chicago. She flattened Chicago as an individual artist with a complex subjectivity into an institution to be challenged, thus calling attention to Chicago's own flattening (or Lu Jie's positioning of her in this role) of her Chinese peers. Turned into the cardboard-cutout doyenne of a Western-centered narrative of feminist art, Chicago responded by boycotting, which in her words is "the absolute opposite of what should have happened."

The divergent responses of these artists to the fantastical siting of the Long March at Lugu Lake demonstrate the instability of the sign "woman." The resources they drew on to be recognized as authors of their own sign—to undo the homogenization and colonization of complex female subjectivities—came from historically and culturally specific archives of theorizing about women and social justice. Their undoing of "womanhouse" demonstrates vigorous and ongoing inquiry into how to dismantle symbolic systems that catch women in double binds. In their site-specific attempts at collaboration with a local community, they also demonstrated the risk of what Hal Foster calls "the artist as ethnographer," in which "the quasi-anthropological role set up for the artist can promote a presuming as much as a questioning of ethnographic authority."[42] The art sited at Lugu Lake opened debates about the assumption of female artists as a "community" but held little meaning for local residents. A Mosuo teenage boy observing one of the lakeside performance pieces commented, "It's no different from all the films and television dramas filmed here. They come, we don't really know what they're doing, and then they leave and we never see them again."

The Question of Feminism in Chinese Contemporary Art

中国当代艺术中的女性主义问题

What was being worked out at Lugu Lake had little to do with, in Mao's terms, "learning from the people." It had much more to do with a question of feminism in Chinese contemporary art. In transnational encounters, artists, curators, and critics repeatedly asked whether "feminist art" existed in China. Variations included "does China have any great women artists?" or "why have there been no great Chinese feminist artists?" The latter arose in consideration of whether there was anything feminist about the work assembled under the label nüxing yishu (women's art), such as site six of The Long March at Lugu Lake. Descriptions of exhibits organized around the topic defined the work as either feminist or feminine or both, blurring the terms in the categorical creation of nüxing yishu, which sometimes refers to art by women and sometimes serves as shorthand for nüxingzhuyi yishu, or feminist art. An overview of responses to this line of questioning demonstrates the contradictions involved in discussions of feminism and Chinese contemporary art, highlighting the contradictions that fissure this art world in general.

泸沽湖所推敲的东西，与毛泽东所说的“向人民学习”几乎无关，而更多关乎中国当代艺术中的女性主义问题。在跨国相遇中，艺术家、策展人和批评家反复询问中国是否存在“女性主义艺术”。变体包括“中国有任何伟大的女性艺术家吗？”或“为什么中国没有伟大的女性主义艺术家？”后者是在思考以“女性艺术”（nüxing yishu）标签集合的作品——如泸沽湖《长征》第六站——是否有任何女性主义成分时提出的。围绕该主题组织的展览说明，把作品界定为女性主义的、具有女性气质的，或两者兼有，在“女性艺术”这一类别创造中模糊了术语，它有时指女性创作的艺术，有时作为“女性主义艺术”（nüxingzhuyi yishu）的简称。对这类质疑回应的概览，展示了关于女性主义与中国当代艺术的讨论中涉及的矛盾，凸显了使这个艺术界整体产生裂隙的矛盾。

> In 1992, a curator from a British national museum traveled to China to investigate the new art being produced. Perhaps because she discovered that most artists were men she was particularly excited to meet me, a female colleague. She asked me if feminist art existed in China. I responded that since China had not resolved its human rights issues, it was hardly possible to talk about women's rights, not to mention feminist art. We both dismissed the topic with a laugh. I did not realize at the time that this acted as a catalyst for some profound thinking.[43]

In 1995, Liao curated an exhibit titled Women's Approach to Chinese Contemporary Art, which featured twelve female artists whose work demonstrated for her the "embryonic" state of a Chinese women's art on the verge of developing a distinct formal language.[44] She then published an art historical survey titled Feminism as Method: Women's Art, which surveys both the representation and role of women in premodern, Maoist, and reform-era Chinese art.[45] In it, she inserts a section on Western female artists, ranging from Berth Morisot to Cindy Sherman, right before her discussion of 1990s art in China. This sequencing sets up a century of Western art history as the road out (chulu) of the past for contemporary Chinese women. Liao thus became an important translator of Western feminist art history into China, and in 1999–2000, she deepened this research through six months of fieldwork in the United States. Her interviews with influential artists of the 1970s feminist movement such as Judy Chicago, Miriam Shapiro, and Carolee Schneemann ran as a regular feature of the new art magazine Next Wave (Xin chao) in 2001.

1995 年，廖雯策划了题为《中国当代艺术中的女性方式》的展览，展出十二位女性艺术家，她们的作品向她展示了中国女性艺术处于“萌芽”状态，即将发展出独特的形式语言。[44] 她随后出版了艺术史综述《女性主义作为方式：女性艺术》，考察女性在前现代、毛泽东时代和改革时期中国艺术中的再现与角色。[45] 书中，她在讨论 1990 年代中国艺术之前插入一节西方女性艺术家，从贝尔特·莫里索到辛迪·舍曼。这一排序把百年西方艺术史设为当代中国女性走出过去的“出路”（chulu）。廖雯由此成为把西方女性主义艺术史译介到中国的重要人物；1999 至 2000 年，她通过在美国六个月田野调查深化了这一研究。她对 1970 年代女性主义运动重要艺术家朱迪·芝加哥、米里亚姆·夏皮罗和卡罗琳·施尼曼的访谈，于 2001 年作为新艺术杂志《新潮》的固定栏目发表。

Beijing-based artist Feng Jiali's response to the question in 2000, as posed by U.S.-based curator Britta Erickson and published in Art AsiaPacific, laments the lack of feminist theoretical reflection in the sudden burst of exhibits featuring art by Chinese women: "In the 1990s and 2000 there have been more exhibitions of women's art than at any other time in China's history.... This marks a significant change, a change that does not necessarily represent a progression or liberation of the creative powers of women in China. For the most part, so-called 'women's art' in China is based purely on the sex of the artist, and not necessarily on recognition of the life-experience differences created by gender."[46] In her accompanying article, Erickson notes the "rise of a feminist spirit in contemporary Chinese art" driven by "an increasing awareness of the extent to which women have been marginalized by the art system."[47]

北京艺术家 Feng Jiali 对 2000 年由常驻美国的策展人林似竹（Britta Erickson）提出并发表于《艺术亚太》的同一问题作出回应，哀叹在中国女性艺术展览突然爆发之际缺乏女性主义理论反思：“1990 年代和 2000 年，中国女性艺术展览比历史上任何时期都多……这标志着一个重大变化，但这种变化未必代表中国女性创造力的进步或解放。中国的所谓‘女性艺术’大多纯粹基于艺术家的生理性别，而未必基于对社会性别所造成的生活经验差异的认识。”[46] 林似竹在配文中指出，“中国当代艺术中女性主义精神的兴起”由“对女性被艺术系统边缘化程度日益增长的认识”所驱动。[47]

In 2008, New York Times art critic Holland Cotter interviewed another Beijing-based artist, Lin Tianmiao. Of their conversation, he writes, "Yet she is cautious about applying the term feminist to herself or her work. Why? The concept is too Western. It is too vague. China is not ready for feminism. China has its own brand of feminism."[48] This ambiguous characterization fails to account for Lin's own nüxing yishu history in the preceding decade. Lin's work was included in many of the early exhibits of work by female artists, such as Liao Wen's Women's Approach to Chinese Contemporary Art. Initially these efforts challenged institutional marginalization and brought recognition to artists like Lin Tianmiao. However, as the category congealed and underwent institutionalization, nüxing yishu became another form of containment, in for example the patronizing list of "essential characteristics of women's art" (including childlike fantasy; apathy toward politics, history, and philosophy; and general disinterest in the male world) produced by Jia Fangzhou, curator of the 1998 survey exhibit Century Woman.[49] For Lin Tianmiao, experimentation with the opportunities afforded by nüxing yishu as a way of theorizing the relationship between art politics and practice quickly led to disappointment and disavowal of the term.

2008 年，《纽约时报》艺术评论家霍兰·科特采访了另一位北京艺术家林天苗。他这样写道："但她对用"女性主义"一词描述自己或自己的作品持谨慎态度。为什么？这个概念太西方了。太含糊。中国还没有准备好接受女性主义。中国有自己品牌的女性主义。"[48] 这一含糊的定性未能考虑林天苗此前十年的"女性艺术"历史。她的作品被纳入许多早期女性艺术家展览，如廖雯的《中国当代艺术中的女性方式》。最初这些努力挑战机构边缘化，为林天苗等艺术家带来承认。然而，随着类别凝固并经历制度化，"女性艺术"变成另一种限制形式。例如，1998 年综述展《世纪·女性》策展人贾方舟列出的恩赐式"女性艺术本质特征"（包括稚气的幻想；对政治、历史和哲学的淡漠；以及对男性世界普遍不感兴趣）。[49] 对林天苗而言，利用"女性艺术"所提供的机会来理论化艺术政治与实践关系的实验，很快导致失望和对该词的否认。

These responses to the question of feminism in Chinese contemporary art reveal two tendencies. First, the term feminist is invoked without specifying what it references: an intentional mode of artistic expression, a methodology for interpreting visual forms of representation, or an analytic for examining the politics and social relations of art worlds. Second, the transnationalism permeating the field of Chinese contemporary art provides the context for the questioning. If Chinese contemporary art is a zone of cultural encounter, the same might be said of feminism, as a field of thought, practice, and social mobilization. Even claims of difference, as for example that between Chinese and Western feminism, do not precede but are made and consolidated through the process of encounter.

这些对中国当代艺术女性主义问题的回应揭示两种倾向。第一，"女性主义"一词被援引，却没有说明它指什么：一种有意的艺术表达模式，一种阐释视觉再现形式的方法，或一种考察艺术界政治与社会关系的分析工具。第二，渗透中国当代艺术领域的跨国主义为质疑提供了语境。如果中国当代艺术是一个文化相遇地带，女性主义作为一个思想、实践和社会动员领域亦然。甚至差异的主张——例如中国与西方女性主义之间的差异——也不是先于相遇而存在，而是通过相遇过程被制造和巩固。

As Chinese contemporary art emerged on the international stage during the 1990s and early 2000s, a minor strain of criticism persistently noted the relative invisibility of female artists. Holland Cotter's article "China's Female Artists Quietly Emerge" provides a footnote to the art market phenomenon of Chinese artists suddenly selling work for record prices at Sotheby's and elsewhere. Briefly surveying artwork by Chinese women, Cotter calls it some of the most innovative around, even though it doesn't garner the same attention as that of their male peers. He concludes, "Contemporary art in China is a man's world. While the art market, all but nonexistent in 1989, has become a powerhouse industry and produced a pantheon of multimillionaire artist-celebrities, there are no women in that pantheon."[50] He was not the first to notice. Ever since the first major exhibits of Chinese avant-garde art appeared, largely in Western art spaces, critics attentive to gender engaged in a counting game that asked where the women were. Britta Erickson gives the following count for early overseas shows: of the sixteen artists in China Avant-Garde in Berlin in 1993 only one was female; China's New Art, Post-1989 in Hong Kong also in 1993 included fifty-two men and two women; and China! in Bonn in 1996 exhibited the work of thirty-one artists, none of whom were female.[51] The outrage of German women over this exclusion motivated the curation of Half of the Sky: Contemporary Chinese Women Artists at Bonn's Frauenmuseum in 1998. Melissa Chiu provides a similar count for international exhibitions of Chinese contemporary art in 1997: "Women accounted for only three of the eighteen artists in Another Long March in Japan, one of seven artists in Immutability and Fashion in Holland, and none of the ten artists in In Between Limits in Korea."[52] She notes the same trend in major exhibitions within China: only two out of thirty-nine artists in the First Academic Exhibition of Chinese Contemporary Art (1996–97) were female, and four of twenty-nine in the 1996 Shanghai Biennale.

1990 年代和 2000 年代初，中国当代艺术在国际舞台出现时，一小股批评声音持续指出女性艺术家的相对不可见。霍兰·科特的文章《中国女性艺术家悄然浮现》为中国艺术家突然在苏富比等地以创纪录价格售出作品的艺术市场现象添加了一个脚注。科特简要回顾中国女性作品，称其为周围最具创新性的艺术之一，尽管不如男性同行的作品那样受关注。他总结道："中国当代艺术是一个男人的世界。艺术市场在 1989 年几乎不存在，如今已成为强大的产业，并造就了一批拥有数百万财富的艺术家名人，但万神殿中没有女性。"[50] 他不是第一个注意到这一点的人。自中国先锋艺术首批重要展览主要出现在西方艺术空间以来，关注性别的批评家就玩起数数游戏，追问女性在哪里。林似竹给出早期海外展览的统计：1993 年柏林《中国先锋》十六位艺术家中只有一位女性；同样在 1993 年香港的《后八九中国新艺术》包括五十二位男性和两位女性；1996 年波恩《中国!》展出三十一位艺术家的作品，其中没有女性。[51] 德国女性对这种排斥的愤怒，促成了 1998 年波恩女性博物馆《半边天：中国当代女性艺术家》的策划。梅利莎·邱（Melissa Chiu）为 1997 年中国当代艺术国际展览提供了类似统计："在日本《另一个长征》的十八位艺术家中，女性仅占三位；在荷兰《不变与时尚》的七位艺术家中占一位；在韩国《界限之间》的十位艺术家中一位也没有。"[52] 她指出中国国内大型展览也有同样趋势：第一届中国当代艺术学术展（1996—97）三十九位艺术家中只有两位女性，1996 年上海双年展二十九位中有四位。

This numbers game arose from a palpable lack of gender parity, yet the “counting who counts” mode of protest rarely goes further to theorize about why this situation persists. The response instead has largely been the organization of exhibits, such as Half of the Sky, inside and outside of China, devoted to the equalizing task of representing Chinese women artists, sometimes as a national subcategory of Asian women artists. Their organizers do not invoke specific feminist theories or platforms. They do, however, contribute to conflicting theorizations of “woman.” To speak of “woman” is always a theoretical proposition, because to do so conceives of a group of individuals as bound by some commonality, and such conceptions are never politically innocent. The critical and curatorial projects that consolidated nüxing yishu often relied on an archive of Western feminist art praxis as a frame of reference, such that inviting Judy Chicago to Lugu Lake seemed an imperative for recognition. The marginalization of women is not solely the result of Chinese “traditional culture,” although some make this reductionist claim, but at least in part the way in which Chinese contemporary art has gone global. Its troubled relationship with feminism lies in the assumption of a universal understanding of what the term means, when in fact it harbors multiple histories of thought, action, critique, and resistance. At odds with one another, these histories create an interlocking set of double binds, generated through cultural encounter over time, regarding female talent and representation.

Interlocking Double Binds

相互交织的双重束缚

Two questions gave rise to my use of the double bind as an interpretive move. First, why has the increasingly rich and sophisticated scholarship (Chinese and Western) on gender, women's movements, and feminism in China proven to be a blind spot for art curators and critics? They reference other bodies of theory as a form of cosmopolitan art world participation but rarely turn to feminist scholars of China. Even when turning to feminist theory, Lu Jie proposed that Long March participants at Lugu Lake read Julia Kristeva rather than prominent Chinese feminist theorists, such as Marxist humanist Li Xiaojiang or literary critics Dai Jinhua and Meng Yue, who adapted Kristeva to develop their theory of Chinese écriture féminine. The second question concerns Chinese art critics and curators who resist Western frames that interpret Chinese contemporary art as derivative or belated. Given that stance, why do they then accept and even promote the idea that nüxing yishu is in a protodevelopmental stage compared to Western feminist art, seemingly displacing a fear of China's backwardness on the global stage onto its women?

两个问题促使我把双重束缚用作阐释策略。第一，为什么日益丰富精深的关于中国性别、妇女运动与女性主义的研究（中国与西方的研究），对艺术策展人和批评家而言竟是盲点？他们援引其他理论体系作为世界性艺术界参与的形式，却很少转向研究中国的女性主义学者。即便转向女性主义理论，卢杰也提议泸沽湖的长征参与者阅读朱莉娅·克里斯蒂娃，而不是马克思主义人道主义者李小江，或文学批评家戴锦华、孟悦等著名中国女性主义理论家——后者借鉴并改造克里斯蒂娃的理论，发展出中国式女性书写理论。第二个问题涉及那些抵制把中国当代艺术解释为派生或落后的西方框架的中国艺术批评家和策展人。既持这种立场，他们为何又接受甚至推广这样一种观念：与西方女性主义艺术相比，“女性艺术”处于原初发展阶段？这似乎把对中国在全球舞台落后的恐惧，转移到中国女性身上。

The double bind describes a communication dilemma resulting from two conflicting messages, which trap their recipient in "unresolvable sequences of experiences," a no-win situation of inevitable failure.[53] It also provides a feminist analytic that seeks a way out, in which the double bind can be viewed as zen koan. Only by deconstructing the double bind as an insidious form of control does release from it become possible. The production and interpretation of art in a meta-ideological mode present powerful means of doing so. Interlocking double binds arising from the art world encounter of Chinese and Western feminisms structured the schizophrenia of mutual recognition and rejection experienced by Judy Chicago and her Chinese "collaborators." The artists at Lugu Lake actively struggled through one or several of these double binds. Laying them out is the first step in moving beyond the trap they set.

双重束缚描述由两个冲突信息造成的沟通困境，它们把接收者困在“无法解决的经验序列”中，一种必然失败的无解局面。[53] 它也提供一种寻求出路的女性主义分析，其中双重束缚可被视为禅宗公案。只有把双重束缚解构为一种阴险的控制形式，才可能从中解脱。以元意识形态模式生产和阐释艺术，提供了做到这一点的有力手段。中国与西方女性主义在艺术界相遇所产生的相互交织的双重束缚，结构了朱迪·芝加哥及其中国“合作者”所体验的相互承认与拒绝的精神分裂。泸沽湖的艺术家积极挣扎于其中一种或数种双重束缚。把它们摆出来，是走出其陷阱的第一步。

1) The first double bind provides a historical basis for contemporary troubles. It returns to the efforts of early twentieth-century reformers to create a modern Chinese nation capable of standing up to colonialism.[54] One foundational influence was Victorian sex theory, which they adopted to displace Confucian kinship protocols with the neologism of nüxing (literally, female sex). Nüxing recast woman as a sexed, biological entity requiring liberation from arranged marriages for sexual selection, which would lead to the eugenic strengthening of the Chinese people. Communist thinkers later jettisoned nüxing as the bourgeois and individualist woman, replacing her with their theorization of funü (women as a collectivity), a massified revolutionary subject to mobilization for state political movements. The Chinese archive of visual art that corresponds with these changing conceptualizations of woman reflects the radical difference between representations of nüxing and funü. Paintings such as Nude in Front of Window (figure 4.07) by Pan Yuliang, who left Shanghai in 1937 to spend the rest of her life in Paris, demonstrate a nüxing sensibility. Her departure from China corresponded with the rise of funü as the Chinese Marxist category of political praxis that replaced nüxing in images like Shan Lianxiao's 1971 propaganda poster To Be an Upright Person, Be This Kind of Person (figure 4.08). Shan, a painter employed by the Dalian Electronic Ceramics Factory, pairs the heroine from The Red Lantern revolutionary opera with a female Red Guard, exhorting viewers to identify with collective funü subjecthood, to "be this kind of person."

1）第一种双重束缚为当代麻烦提供历史基础。它回溯二十世纪初改革者创建能够抵抗殖民主义的现代中国国家的努力。[54] 一个基础性影响是维多利亚时代的性理论，他们采用它，以“女性”（nüxing，字面意为女性性别）这一新词取代儒家亲属礼制。“女性”把女人重铸为性的、生物性的实体，需要从包办婚姻中解放出来，以进行性选择，进而导致中国人的优生强化。共产党思想家后来抛弃“女性”这个资产阶级、个人主义女人，代之以他们对“妇女”（funü，作为集体）的理论化——一个被大众化、为国家的政治运动而动员的革命主体。与这些变化中的女人概念相应的中国视觉艺术档案，反映了“女性”与“妇女”再现之间的根本差异。潘玉良 1937 年离开上海、余生留在巴黎，她的《窗前裸女》（图 4.07）等画作展示了一种“女性”感性。她离开中国，恰逢“妇女”作为中国马克思主义政治实践范畴兴起并取代“女性”——例如 Shan Lianxiao1971 年的宣传画《做人要做这样的人》（图 4.08）。在大连电子陶瓷厂工作的画家 Shan Lianxiao，把革命歌剧《红灯记》中的女英雄与一位女红卫兵并置，劝告观者认同集体的“妇女”主体性，“做这样的人”。

Herein lies the bind: Embracing these new theorizations of woman as nüxing or funü enabled women to actively participate in the public realm of cultural production. But embracing the subject positions of erotic or massified woman also cast them as lesser human beings, as needing liberation, such that to be active in cultural production was seen as exceptional rather than normative for women.

束缚就在于此：拥抱这些关于女人的新理论——作为“女性”或“妇女”——使女性得以积极参与文化生产的公共领域。但拥抱情欲化或大众化女人的主体位置，也把她们塑造为次等的人，需要解放，以致在文化生产中活跃被视为女性的例外而非常态。

These successive articulations of theoretical woman—the active and layered history of thinking about gender and women's liberation in China—also led to the difficulty of translating the term feminist. Within China gender studies, it is commonplace to comment on the many coinages in Chinese over the twentieth century to refer to the singular term feminism in English: nüquan zhuyi, nüxing zhuyi, nannü pingdeng zhuyi, nüquang yundong, funü yundong.[55] Of this linguistic disquiet, Barlow notes, "It is significant that the historical flexibility of colloquial Chinese has allowed for so many ways to phrase the word feminism or the movement to center female subjects."[56] She emphasizes that this ongoing linguistic reworking is a constitutive part of feminist practice in Sinophone criticism.

这些关于理论女人的相继表述——中国关于性别和妇女解放思想的活跃而多层次历史——也导致“女性主义”一词的翻译困难。在中国性别研究中，人们常谈及二十世纪汉语为英语单一术语feminism 创造的多种说法：女权主义、女性主义、男女平等主义、女权运动、妇女运动。[55] 关于这种语言不安，白露指出：“值得注意的是，汉语口语的历史灵活性允许如此多方式来表述女性主义一词，或使女性主体中心化的运动。”[56] 她强调，这种持续的语言重铸是华语圈批评中女性主义实践的构成部分。

Indeed, the phrasing of women's or feminist art as nüxing yishu signals another reworked understanding of "woman." It represents reform-era rejection of the Maoist, statist formulation of funü through the humanistic argument that it suppressed female subjectivity in the attempt to remake women in the image of men. A new nüxing, bearing residues of it conceptual predecessor, appeared in accounts such as the following by art critic Xu Hong: "After 1989 individual experimentation began to emerge in Chinese art, bringing to an end the relentless collectivist symbolism of previous years. Women's consciousness began to emerge and women began to explore their own experience and find an appropriate form of expression. Most female artists sought to define the nature of women's consciousness or affirm women's consciousness itself."[57] Yang Li, curator of The Metamorphosing Female (Zhuanbian zhong de nüxing), a 2008 exhibit in Shanghai, writes in a similar vein: "Compared with their predecessors, the female artists of the new generation are more independent and more aware of their female consciousness. Based on their instincts and rich emotions, they create artworks from their unique female perspectives, depicting their real experiences, and forming in this process their highly individualized artistic languages."[58] This emphasis on the artistic development of women's consciousness based on embodied female experience pervades work such as Liu Hong's paintings from the 1990s. The isolated figures in her Soliloquy series (figure 4.09) are hybrids that combine the nüxing nude and the collective red funü visage/blindfold and engage in an introspective discourse, as if on the verge of emerging from past constraints. Liu, a member of the painting faculty at the Sichuan Academy of Fine Art who became emblematic of nüxing yishu in accounts such as Liao Wen's Feminism as Method: Women's Art, traveled together with students and friends to Lugu Lake as an observer. The trap of female exceptionality persists in the nominal rejection of feminism by Chinese artists whose work, nonetheless, reflects complex forms of gender consciousness. The recuperation of women marginalized by the international art market system through the currency of nüxing yishu reveals a freighted relationship with the history of feminist praxis in China. Nüxing yishu often ended up feeling like a restrictive category, as in site six at Lugu Lake or art history chapters that partition women to the side.

的确，把女性或女性主义艺术表述为“女性艺术”，标志着对“女人”的另一种重铸理解。它代表改革时期对毛泽东时代国家主义“妇女”表述的人道主义拒绝，理由是这种表述在试图按男性形象重塑女性时压制了女性主体性。一种新的“女性”带着其概念前身的残余，出现在如下艺术批评家徐虹的叙述中：“1989 年之后，个人实验开始在中国艺术中出现，终结了此前数年持续不休的集体主义象征表达。女性意识开始浮现，女性开始探索自身经验并寻找适当表达形式。大多数女性艺术家试图界定女性意识的本质，或肯定女性意识本身。”[57] 2008 年上海展览《转变中的女性》策展人 Yang Li 也写下类似的话：“与前代相比，新一代女性艺术家更独立，也更自觉地意识到自己的女性意识。基于本能和丰富情感，她们从独特的女性视角创作，描绘真实经验，并在这一过程中形成高度个人化的艺术语言。”[58] 这种基于具身女性经验对女性意识艺术发展的强调，遍及刘虹 1990 年代的绘画等作品。她《独白》系列（图 4.09）中的孤立人物是混合体：结合了“女性”裸体与集体红色“妇女”的面容 / 眼罩，进行内省式言说，仿佛即将从过去的约束中浮现。刘虹是四川

美术学院绘画系教师，在廖雯《女性主义作为方式：女性艺术》等叙述中成为“女性艺术”的象征；她与学生和朋友一起前往泸沽湖作为观察者。女性例外性的陷阱，在中国艺术家对女性主义名义上的拒绝中持续存在，尽管她们的作品反映了复杂的性别意识形式。通过“女性艺术”的通货，被国际艺术市场体系边缘化的女性得以恢复，这揭示了与中国女性主义实践史沉重的关系。“女性艺术”常常最终成为一个限制性类别，正如在泸沽湖第六站，或把女性分到旁侧的艺术史章节中。

2) If Chinese women struggle to be added to the canon of Chinese contemporary art, and through engagement with it, to change the possible options of what this art can be, then they hazard being seen as outside or derivative of the male-dominated avant-garde that has defined it so far. If Chinese women struggle to be added to the canon of feminist art, and through engagement with it, to change the possible options of what this art can be, then they hazard being seen as derivative of or just a local branch of international (Western) feminist art.

2）如果中国女性努力被加入中国当代艺术经典，并通过参与改变这种艺术可能是什么，那么她们就有被视为局外人或迄今定义该领域的男性主导先锋之派生者的风险。如果中国女性努力被加入女性主义艺术经典，并通过参与改变这种艺术可能是什么，那么她们就有被视为国际（西方）女性主义艺术的派生者、或仅仅是其地方分支的风险。

This double bind reveals a parallel between how the international market conferred value on a male avant-garde in China after 1989 and the emergence of nüxing yishu around 1995, the year Beijing hosted the UN Fourth World Conference on Women. In the Western critique surrounding the conference of the Chinese state's hostility to human and therefore women's rights, the art corollary was to ask why China doesn't have the kind of feminist art that the West does. Artists like Lin Tianmiao, whose work appeared in several of these 1990s shows, concludes however, "In the end, all the exhibitions seemed to achieve was to simply demonstrate that Chinese women could produce art."[59] In her 2008 interview with Holland Cotter, she disavows any feminist identification. She was also one of the only female artists to participate in the Long March outside of the Lugu Lake "women's section."

这一双重束缚揭示了国际艺术市场在 1989 年后赋予中国男性先锋价值，与 1995 年前后 " 女性艺术 " 兴起之间的平行关系——那一年北京主办联合国第四次世界妇女大会。在围绕该会议的西方批评中，中国国家对人权、从而是对女性权利的敌视，艺术上的对应物就是追问为什么中国没有西方那种女性主义艺术。林天苗等艺术家的作品出现在若干这类 1990 年代展览中，她却总结说：“

最终，所有展览似乎只达到了一个效果：证明中国女性能够创作艺术。”[59] 在 2008 年接受霍兰 • 科特采访时，她否认任何女性主义认同。她也是除泸沽湖 “ 女性部分 ” 之外，少数参与长征的女性艺术家之一。

3) If contemporary artists in China attempt to redefine their feminism by critiquing or distancing themselves from the Maoist approach to women's liberation, then they cut themselves off from the historical resources of China's long twentieth-century of feminist activism. If contemporary artists in China attempt to redefine their feminism by drawing on China's historical resources, then international feminists view them as too statist or too socialist.

3）如果中国当代艺术家试图通过批评毛主义妇女解放路径或与之保持距离来重新定义其女性主义，那么她们便切断了自己与中国漫长二十世纪女性主义行动主义历史资源的联系。如果中国当代艺术家试图利用中国历史资源重新定义女性主义，那么国际女性主义者就会认为她们太国家主义或太社会主义。

This double bind reveals the poverty of an international feminist rhetoric that erases the influence of Chinese Marxist feminism on the thinking of Western feminist theories of the 1960s and 1970s. Take, for example, Julia Kristeva's About Chinese Women and the zest with which she describes her feminist interlocutors: "These girls who brandish pistols and paintbrushes, who liberate themselves from their husbands and fathers under the portrait of Mao, and leave their children, their calligraphy, their exploits in the field of production, science, or the current ideological campaign, as the sole evidence of their jouissance."[60] Visual art in the mode of "these girls who brandish pistols and paintbrushes" is now so abject, propaganda not art or recuperable only through parody, in its international art market status that it must be eradicated as precursor to contemporary feminist art practices.

这一双重束缚揭示了国际女性主义修辞的贫乏，它抹除了中国马克思主义女性主义对 1960 和 1970 年代西方女性主义理论的影响。例如朱莉娅 • 克里斯蒂娃的《中国妇女》，以及她描述其女性主义对话者时的热情：“ 这些手持手枪和画笔的姑娘，在毛泽东画像下从丈夫和父亲那里解放出来，把自己的孩子、书法，以及在生产、科学或当前意识形态运动领域的功绩，留作她们享乐的唯一证据。”[60] “ 这些手持手枪和画笔的姑娘 ” 式的视觉艺术，如今在国际艺术市场地位中如此低贱——是宣传而非艺术，或只有通过戏仿才可挽救——以致它作为当代女性主义艺术实践前身的地位也必须被抹去。

4) If Chinese female artists continue to work in socialist genres, such as socialist realist painting, then they identify with the patriarchal order of the state, which liberated them in name but not in action. If Chinese female artists attempt to redefine their art practice through dialogue with the Western archive of feminist art from the 1960s and 1970s, then they are seen as latecomers, less advanced, in need of feminist tutelage or rescue by the West.

4）如果中国女性艺术家继续使用社会主义类型，如社会主义现实主义绘画，那么她们便认同了国家的父权秩序——这个秩序在名义上而非实际上解放了她们。如果中国女性艺术家试图通过与 1960 和 1970 年代西方女性主义艺术档案对话来重新定义艺术实践，那么她们就会被视为后来者、不那么先进，需要西方的女性主义教导或拯救。

Unlike the reworking of socialist image making practices by Lei and Huang, the site-specific installation and performance pieces at Lugu Lake by Li Shurui, Su Ruya, and Song Yangping draw on transnationally circulating, postmodern modes of art making. This generic engagement with the cosmopolitan sphere of art, even though grounded in resolutely local concerns and aesthetics, opens them up to being labeled as belated, of modeling themselves after the site-specificity of Chicago's Womanhouse thirty years later.

与雷燕、黄茹对社会主义图像制作实践的改造不同，李姝睿、苏茹娅和宋雁萍在泸沽湖的场域特定装置与行为作品，动用了跨国流通的后现代艺术制作模式。这种通过艺术类型参与世界主义艺术领域的方式，尽管扎根于坚定的地方关切与美学，却使她们被贴上迟来者的标签，被视为三十年后模仿芝加哥《女人屋》场域特定性的效仿者。

This double bind opens the door to instances in which Western curators have organized exhibits of Chinese "women's art" that locates the empowerment of Chinese women in gallery and publication spaces outside of China, often under statements such as "there has been no feminist movement in China comparable to that in the West."[61] An example of the extreme end of this phenomenon is the following gloss from the 2002 exhibit Femininity in Contemporary Asian Art, curated by Patricia Karetzky for galleries at City College of New York and Bard College: "In communication as well, women in Asia are set apart from those in Western society in their general reticence to interact in mixed company.... Their conversation is measured, their voices childlike in pitch and simple in verbal expression. These cultural restraints on female social behavior are the result of traditional Asian values. The women in this exhibition have experienced Western style freedom of expression and as a result are aware of the varied cultural paradigms of feminine behavior and ideas of femininity."[62]

这一双重束缚为以下情况打开大门：西方策展人组织中国“女性艺术”展览，把中国女性的赋权定位于中国境外的画廊和出版物空间，往往以“中国没有可与西方相比的女性主义运动”之类声明为前提。[61] 该现象极端一端的例子，是帕特里夏·卡雷茨基（Patricia Karetzky）为纽约城市学院和巴德学院画廊策划的 2002 年展览《当代亚洲艺术中的女性气质》中的如下说明：“在交流方面也是如此，亚洲女性与西方社会女性不同，她们普遍不愿在男女混合的场合交往……她们的谈吐有分寸，声调像孩童般尖细，言语表达简单。这些对女性社会行为的文化约束，是亚洲传统价值观的结果。本次展览中的女性体验过西方式的表达自由，因此意识到女性行为与女性气质观念的不同文化范式。”[62]

5) If Chinese feminist art is posited as something with local roots and concerns and resistant to Western interpretation, then it does not circulate overseas and accrue the value conferred by international recognition, such as exhibition in “world-class” Western museums or auction at Sotheby’s. If Chinese feminist art is posited as an outgrowth of cross-border artistic and intellectual exchange, then it tends to be seen as simply a local, particular instantiation of the “universal” Western model.

5）如果中国女性主义艺术被设定为有地方根源和关切、抵制西方阐释，那么它就不会在海外流通，也无法获得国际承认所赋予的价值，例如在“世界级”西方博物馆展出或在苏富比拍卖。如果中国女性主义艺术被设定为跨境艺术与思想交流的产物，那么它往往只被视为“普遍”西方模式的地方、特殊实例。

The depth of local knowledge—regarding ethnic classification in China, the development of tourist economies as part of post-Mao market reform, and Han imaginaries of the nation’s ethnic nationalities—fundamental to a nuanced understanding of pieces such as Sun Guojuan’s Stuck to You or Zhang Lun’s Lugu Lake–Happy Existence may present a challenge for international audiences. But these cosmopolitan art experiments, which started, after all, from their own nuanced understanding of local knowledge such as “who is Judy Chicago” and “what is Womanhouse,” also challenge a Western-centered version of cosmopolitanism. Being seen as simply a local, particular instantiation of the “universal” Western model is exactly what the Chinese artists at Lugu Lake resisted in their use of copyright as a situational art piece. Their manifesto responded to and attempted to undo this last double bind.

The manifesto presented via Lu Jie to Judy Chicago on the artists' second day in Lugu Lake represents debates that had been brewing long before Chicago arrived in China. The document's final form, distilled in hours of contentious, late-night discussion, likewise represents a momentary crystallization of the artists' ongoing thought processes and experiments with materials at hand, in this case, the language of copyright, authorship, and intellectual property circulating widely in China at the time. The manifesto as contract, requiring that all parties become signatories, served as a means of channeling grievances against the interlocking double binds that positioned Chinese women artists at the margins of Chinese contemporary art and global feminist art. Through their presentation of it to Lu and Chicago, they subverted the smooth unfolding of the curatorial plan envisioned by either figure. Although Lu Jie returned to the historical event of the Long March to assert the originality of Chinese cultural production and its cosmopolitan influence, he did so through the assumption of a leadership position that rankled those whom he rallied to the cause. In his negotiation with the artists about the issues they raised, he ended up lecturing them about his responsibilities as a curator. His ironic adoption of Communist political language slid into the register of hardened official rhetoric. Judy Chicago performed her assigned role of pedagogical feminist authority, which aligned with the teaching style she developed in the early 1970s as an instructor in the Feminist Art Programs at Fresno State College and California Institute of the Arts.[63] Her encounter with Chinese artists at Lugu Lake, however, was not one with students, but women who saw themselves as peers with different yet valuable knowledge. They, in turn, enacted an oppositional politics, a radical questioning of authority that drew on Maoist revolutionary tradition. Yet, in the moment of China's linkage with transnational capitalism, their challenge to authority came in a claim to authorship rights.

在艺术家们抵达泸沽湖的第二天，通过卢杰呈交给朱迪·芝加哥的宣言，代表了在芝加哥来华之前早已酝酿的辩论。文件最终形式在数小时充满争议的深夜讨论中凝练而成，同样代表艺术家持续思考过程与手头材料实验的短暂结晶——在此，材料就是当时在中国广泛流通的著作权、作者身份和知识产权语言。宣言作为合同，要求各方签署，成为宣泄不满的渠道，针对的是把中国女性艺术家置于中国当代艺术和全球女性主义艺术边缘的相互交织的双重束缚。通过向卢杰和芝加哥呈交宣言，她们颠覆了两人各自设想的策展计划的平滑展开。尽管卢杰回到长征历史事件，以主张中国文化生产的原创性及其世界主义影响，但他这样做时所采取的领袖位置，却令被号召者恼怒。在与艺术家协商她们提出的问题时，他最终向她们讲授自己作为策展人的责任。他讽刺性地挪用共产党政治语言，滑入僵硬的官方修辞语调。朱迪·芝加哥扮演了分配给她的女性主义教育权威角色，这符合她 1970 年代初在弗雷斯诺州立学院和加州艺术学院女性主义艺术项目任教师时形成的教学风格。[63] 然而，她在泸沽湖与中国艺术家的相遇不是与学生，而是与那些视自己为同行、拥有不同而有价值知识的女性。她们反过来实施一种对抗政治，一种借用毛主义革命传统对权威的激进质疑。然而，在中国与跨国资本主义接轨的时刻，她们对权威的挑战以著作权主张的形式出现。

They issued their manifesto approximately one decade after Deng Xiaoping's "tour of the south" in January 1992, an official turn toward accelerated marketization and privatization. Shortly after, China became a signatory to the Berne Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works. As Ariana Hernández-Reguant describes in her work on the late socialist art industry in Cuba, European powers established this convention in 1886 during an initial stage of decolonization, especially of the Spanish empire, to protect ownership of scientific and artistic works developed in a colonial context.[64] Indigenous knowledge had contributed significantly to "Western" products ranging from pharmaceuticals to painting styles, yet the modernist regime of intellectual property erased these non-Western linkages and the role of copying in innovation and creativity. Cultural borders were inscribed under the philosophical banners of civilization and possessive individualism, with citizens invested with rights and duties under the nation-state. Modern, Western jurisprudence also uniquely privileged intellectual labor over manual labor by granting creative workers property rights over their ideas, a practice antithetical to socialism's commitment to collectivism and rejected by countries like the People's Republic of China until post-1992 market integration. At the end of the millennium, as China prepared to enter the World Trade Organization, officials revised national laws, including those concerning copyright enforcement, to conform to WTO regulations. The encounter between Judy Chicago and Chinese artists took place less than one year after China's official entry to the WTO. Of the persistent criticism of China as pirate nation, Laikwan Pang observes that the international property rights regime fosters culturalist myths of original and counterfeit: "The legitimate commodity has an author, while the pirated product does not. If China is seen as world pirate, the country then lacks an author/subject position in the international community proper."[65] The prominence of copyright discourse in public debate about China's global status seeped into the Lugu Lake manifesto assertion of a Chinese author/subject position in relation to Judy Chicago as stand-in for global feminist art.

她们发表宣言大约在邓小平 1992 年 1 月“南方之行”十年后——那是官方转向加速市场化与私有化的时刻。此后不久，中国成为《保护文学和艺术作品伯尔尼公约》签署国。正如阿里亚娜·埃尔南德斯-雷关特（Ariana Hernández-Reguant）在其关于古巴晚期社会主义艺术产业的研究中所描述，欧洲列强于 1886 年在去殖民化初期——尤其是西班牙帝国去殖民化——制定该公约，以保护在殖民语境中发展的科学与艺术作品的所有权。[64] 从药品到绘画风格，原住民知识对“西方”产品有重大贡献，但现代主义知识产权制度抹除了这些非西方联系，以及复制在创新和创造中的作用。文化边界在文明和占有式个人主义的哲学旗帜下被铭刻，公民在民族国家下被赋予权利与义务。现代西方法理学还赋予智力劳动高于体力劳动的独特特权，赋予创意工作者对其观念的财产权；这种做法与社会主义对集体主义的承诺相悖，也被中华人民共和国等国拒绝，直到 1992 年后市场一体化。千禧年之交，中国准备加入世界贸易组织时，官员修订国家法律，包括著作权执法相关法律，以符合 WTO 规定。朱迪·芝加哥与中国艺术家的相遇发生在中国正式入世不到一年后。针对中国作为盗版国家的持续批评，彭丽君（Laikwan Pang）观察到，国际知识产权制度助长关于原创与伪造的文化主义神话：“合法商品有作者，盗版产品则没有。如果中国被视为世界盗版者，那么这个国家在国际共同体中便缺乏作者／主体位置。”[65] 著作权话语在中国全球地位公共辩论中的突出地位，渗入泸沽湖宣言，主张中国作者／主体相对于作为全球女性主义艺术替身的朱迪·芝加哥的位置。

Lisa Rofel has argued that the quest of the Chinese state to "fold economic reform into neoliberal institutions such as the WTO" creates an environment in which individuals learn to desire the possession of one's self and the intellectual labor associated with that self, thus leading to self-regulation of the subject.[66] While the Chinese artists at Lugu Lake were invested in the neoliberal idea of laying claim to the product of their own knowledge and labor, they also worked from a Long March–inspired tradition of revolutionary, oppositional politics to defend a collective desire for recognition as artists who are not exploited as symbolic resources but who themselves act as authors of symbols. They do not take up copyright itself as something to defend or attack; rather, it becomes a rich semiotic form that helps them address the problem of the interlocking double binds that constrain them. It is as a collective, in a collaboratively produced document, that they assert possession of an individual self. They do so to resist being subsumed under someone else's authority, one they believe does not have their collective interest at heart. Their adoption of the global language of copyright serves as a critical response to versions of feminism imposed on them by others—by Judy Chicago, Lu Jie, or the Chinese state. Their efforts against being authoritatively framed by someone else included persuading me to document their activities in a way they believed would be more on their terms than what Lu Jie and his team recorded. In the same guerrilla fashion, they also documented and presented their interpretation of the encounter that had taken place in Luoshui. Upon returning from Lugu Lake, Kunming-based artists Fu Liya and Sun Guojuan organized an exhibition at the Yunnan Art Academy, where they displayed written and photographic records of the journey to Lugu Lake, the events that transpired, and artworks completed on site. The exhibit ran from August 4–8, 2002, and an estimated four hundred people came to view it.

罗丽莎论证，中国国家“把经济改革纳入 WTO 等新自由主义制度”的追求，创造了一种环境，个人在其中学会渴望拥有自我及与自我相关的智力劳动，从而导致主体的自我规训。[66] 泸沽湖的中国艺术家虽然投入于主张自身知识与劳动产品的新自由主义观念，却也借助受长征启发的革命性对抗政治传统，以捍卫一种集体欲望：被承认为艺术家，不被当作象征资源剥削，而是自己作为符号的作者。她们并不把著作权本身当作要捍卫或攻击的对象；相反，它成为一种丰富的符号形式，帮助她们处理约束自己的相互交织的双重束缚。她们是在一份合作生产的文件中，作为一个集体，主张对个体自我的占有。她们这样做，是为了抵制被纳入他人的权威——她们相信那并不把她们的集体利益放在心上。她们采用全球通行的著作权语言，批判性地回应朱迪·芝加哥、卢杰或中国国家等他人强加给她们的女性主义版本。她们反对被别人权威地框定，努力还包括说服我以她们认为更符合自身意愿的方式记录活动，而不是卢杰团队所记录的那样。她们以同样的游击方式，记录并呈现自己对落水村相遇的诠释。从泸沽湖回来后，昆明艺术家付丽雅和孙国娟在云南艺术学院组织了一场展览，展出前往泸沽湖的书面与摄影记录、发生的事件，以及现场完成的作品。展览于 2002 年 8 月 4 日至 8 日举行，估计有四百人前来观看。

Judy Chicago at Lugu Lake was not a unique phenomenon. As she asserted there, “Other women have done Womanhouses all over the world.” She has served as an inspiration to female artists around the world, yet the way she is brought into “other” locations often positions her as central to a canon of feminist art that starts with the West and then attempts to fold non-Western artists into its narrative. Artists involved in these projects have similarly resisted this after-the-fact, enfolding move, in ways that draw on culturally specific histories of art, gender, and feminism. For example, Judy Chicago joined Taiwanese, Korean, and Japanese women artists in the 1997–1998 Lord of the Rim: In Herself/For Herself exhibit, held in the small northern Taiwanese city of Hsin Chuang. In a more polite politics of acknowledgement and detachment, the participating Asian artists carried out their own site-specific work focusing on local women laborers in this industrial textile city, exploring gender, class, and ethnicity in the context of Pacific Rim industrialization, militarism/imperialism, and transnational trade. In Ying-Ying Chien’s analysis of the exhibit, the “minor” transnational networks explored by the artists involved did not need to be mediated by or disseminated through the metropolitan West. Their work instead made Chicago’s inclusion in the exhibit peripheral: “In one corner of the Lord of the Rim exhibit space there runs continuously a video about Judy Chicago called ‘Women’s House,’ which takes its inspiration from concepts and imagery of a woman’s art that Chicago developed in the 1970s; this quiet full flowering in 1990s Taiwan-Hsin Chuang may well have exceeded what Chicago expected to find here.”[67] The artists who participated in site six of The Long March similarly attest to the need for radical reformation of what constitutes the “global” feminist art canon, so that it allows for the multiple historical contingencies through which feminist artists and artwork come into being.[68] Disavowing a unifying project of feminism is not a sign of failure but of the ongoing debate and critical reflection at the heart of feminist thought and intervention.

朱迪·芝加哥在泸沽湖并非独特现象。正如她在那里所宣称的，“世界各地的其他女性也做过《女人屋》。”她一直是世界各地女性艺术家的灵感来源，但她被带入“其他”地点的方式，往往把她置于从西方开始的女性主义艺术经典中心，然后试图把非西方艺术家纳入其叙事。参与这些项目的艺术家同样抵制这种事后纳入，方式动用了文化特定的艺术、性别和女性主义历史。例如，朱迪·芝加哥参加了 1997 至 1998 年在台湾北部小城新庄举办的《边缘之主：在她自身 / 为她自身》展览，与台湾、韩国和日本女性艺术家一起。亚洲参展艺术家以一种更礼貌的承认与疏离政治，开展自己的场域特定作品，聚焦这座纺织工业城市的本地女工，在环太平洋工业化、军国主义 / 帝国主义与跨国贸易语境中探讨性别、阶级和族裔。在简瑛瑛（Ying-Ying Chien）对展览的分析中，艺术家所探索的“次要”跨国网络无需通过西方大都市来中介或传播。她们的作品反而使芝加哥在展览中的存在变得边缘：“在《边缘之主》展览空间的一个角落，持续放映着一部关于朱迪·芝加哥的录像，名为《女人屋》，其灵感来自芝加哥 1970 年代发展的女性艺术观念与意象；这场 1990 年代台湾新庄的安静盛放，很可能超出了芝加哥在此地所期待见到的。”[67] 参与《长征》第六站的艺术家同样证明，需要彻底改革“全球”女性主义艺术经典的构成，使其容纳女性主义艺术家和作品得以生成的多种历史偶然。[68] 否弃一个统一的女性主义计划，不是失败的标志，而是处于女性主义思想与介入核心的持续辩论与批判反思的标志。

The artists in the Feminist Sight Lines chapters to follow exhibit exactly this kind of ongoing reflection. They excavate, in their work and life histories, the institutions and sociohistorical processes that made them as artists and women. Their critical historiographical consciousness, cultivated by being on art world peripheries, unhinges woman from the literal and figurative work she has performed for the nation in modern and contemporary art. Their attempts to move in, through, and outside of dominant ideologies about women respond to the control exerted by interlocking double binds. My encounters with them likewise shifted my understanding of feminist art, from a label for a particular object, event, or project to an epistemological field of practice. Their aesthetics respond to the state socialist legacy of monumentality in Chinese contemporary art through an emphasis on ephemerality: of life, of art, of archival fact. They address the problematic of art as monument, through explorations of a genre like large-scale history painting, of a cultural symbol like the Great Wall, or of an event like the Long March. They remember loss and erasure and call into question an impulse to monumentality, on the scale of the nation, premised on disappearance.

11. Although artists Wu Weihe and Bai Chongmin eventually persuaded me to travel to Lugu Lake, I did take Lu and Qiu up on their suggestion and organized a mapping project in Lijiang, site five of the Long March. On the way from Kunming to Lugu Lake, we stopped in this Naxi city. After its old town received designation as a UNESCO heritage site in 1997, it became an increasingly popular tourist destination. With the help of several artists with whom I was traveling, I asked multiple people—local Naxi residents, foreign tourists, and Chinese from Beijing and Shanghai—to draw maps of Lijiang based on their experience. Long March organizers later lost the maps but posted photographs of them displayed as part of the Lijiang Field Report Exhibit on their website: www.longmarchproject.com /images/o-site5/czhd/ljtybg/e-index.htm (accessed Sept. 2017). 68. In 2010, the Tate Modern in London, one of the most influential art museums in the world, displayed a timeline of major artistic movements and figures from the twentieth and twentieth-first centuries. All of the artists listed under its plotting of "Feminism," a movement assigned to the 1960s, hailed from dominant Euro-American centers. The absence of contemporaries from other locations reflects a set of historiographical and political problems around the institutionalization of feminist art in the West. This occlusion of feminist art and artists from non-Western contexts was also in evidence at the 2009 exhibition Elles at the Centre Pompidou in Paris, whose curators proposed a revision of the category of contemporary art by representing it exclusively through works by women artists in the museum's permanent collection. Contemporaneous attempts to survey feminist art practice on a more global scale partially challenged the Tate and Pompidou narratives. Global Feminisms (2007, Brooklyn Museum of Art) and Wack! Art and the Feminist Revolution (2007, MoCA, Los Angeles and PS1, New York City) invoked the figure of the postcolonial or non-Western woman artist, even as their curators subsumed multiple histories of feminism within a single overarching narrative centered in the West. The story of a rebellious maidservant on Hainan Island who was liberated by a Communist women's militia became a revolutionary classic in socialist China. At the turn of the millennium, just as her fierce female attitude seemed poised to make a final exit, she leapt—fists clenched and long braid flying—across the surface of a large, four-canvas oil painting by Li Tianpian. Although she held impeccable academy credentials and a teaching position at Beijing's Central Minorities University, Li struggled to find a way forward. As a young oil painter trained in socialist realism, she found herself wedged between female representational modes of different eras. She had submitted this painting in 1999 as one of two graduation pieces for her Master's degree from the Hangzhou China Academy of Art. It depicts varied representations of an early Communist women's detachment formed in the 1930s. Their rebellious posture provides a dramatic contrast with Li's own delicately rendered appearance within the piece.

海南岛上一个反抗的女奴被共产党妇女民兵队解放的故事，成为社会主义中国的革命经典。世纪之交，正当她那刚烈的女性姿态似乎准备最后一次退场时，她跃起——双拳紧握，长辫飞扬——横跃在李天翩一幅四联大幅油画的画面上。李天翩拥有无可挑剔的学院资历，并在北京中央民族大学任教，却难以找到前进的道路。作为一名受过社会主义现实主义训练的年轻油画家，她发现自己卡在不同时代的女性再现模式之间。1999 年，她把这幅画作为杭州中国美术学院硕士学位的两件毕业作品之一提交。画作描绘了 1930 年代成立的早期共产党妇女武装的多种再现。她们的叛逆姿态与画中李天翩本人细腻描摹的容貌形成戏剧性对比。

The Red Detachment of Women (Hongse niangzi jun), a film based on a novel based on actual historical events, was originally released on July 1, 1961, to commemorate the fortieth anniversary of the founding of the Chinese Communist Party. In the decade that followed, the film became a revolutionary ballet and a revolutionary model opera, both of which were then turned back into films.[1] During the Cultural Revolution, it was one of only eight model plays permitted for public performance. Many in post-Mao China criticize this doctrinaire control of culture, which required performers to enact the same revolutionary plays again and again. Nonetheless these socialist realist dramas were inextricably linked with a twentieth-century Chinese desire to be modern, a desire for social relations that would transcend existing forms. They expressed what Susan Buck-Morss calls the "dreamworld of mass utopia," a vision shared by those in both the East and West during the Cold War.[2] While the dream of socialist realism as an emancipatory aesthetic now hung in shreds, this abject form contained a message about the promise and danger of ethnographic detachment and typification, about attempting to convey complex subjectivities through a singular, commanding representation.

《红色娘子军》改编自小说，小说又取材于真实历史事件，电影于 1961 年 7 月 1 日首映，纪念中国共产党成立四十周年。此后十年间，这部电影被改编为革命芭蕾舞剧和革命样板京剧，两者随后又都被拍成电影。[1] 文化大革命期间，它是获准公开演出的仅有的八部样板戏之一。后毛泽东时代的中国许多人批评这种教条式的文化控制，它要求演员一遍又一遍地搬演同样的革命戏剧。然而，这些社会主义现实主义戏剧与二十世纪中国追求现代性的愿望密不可分，与超越既有形式的社会关系愿望密不可分。它们表达了苏珊·巴克-莫斯（Susan Buck-Morss）所谓 " 大众乌托邦的梦想世

界 ”，这一愿景在冷战期间东西方都有人共享。[2] 尽管社会主义现实主义作为一种解放美学的梦想如今已成碎片，这一卑微的形式仍包含着关于民族志式抽离与典型化的承诺与危险的信息，关于试图通过单一、统摄性的再现传达复杂主体性的信息。

I gleaned my lesson from encounters with this painting and its painter. While Li Tianpian is not particularly well known in China or abroad, her story reveals tensions that many Chinese artists negotiated as the organization of the arts and social life underwent millennial transitions. Occasionally caught up in the excitement of reform-era China's promise of burgeoning individuality, Li yet remained unwilling to dismiss the propaganda imagery of the Cultural Revolution as national kitsch from a period when time stood still. She provides a lesson in how not to typify or commodify the past, but to reopen its potential and revolutionary promise to extend the range of what it is possible for a woman to do.

我从与这幅画及其画家的相遇中得到教益。李天翩在中国或国外都不算特别知名，但她的故事揭示了在艺术与社会生活组织经历千禧年转型之际，许多中国艺术家所调停的紧张。李天翩偶尔为改革时期中国对新兴个体性的承诺而振奋，却仍不愿把文化大革命的宣传图像贬为民族媚俗品，视为一个时间停滞时期的产物。她提供了一个教训：如何不把过去典型化或商品化，而是重新打开其潜能和革命承诺，以扩展一个女人可能做什么的范围。

When I first met Li Tianpian in 2001 she was thirty-one. She had been teaching in the studio art department of the Central Minorities University for two years.[3] One of her colleagues, Yuan Yaomin, had arranged for me to attend classes in their department. After spending the morning in a first-year oil painting materials class (a lecture that covered in technical detail various forms of canvas preparation: animal glues, gesso, and tempera), I met Yuan Yaomin and Li Tianpian for lunch. They were the only women in the department and spent much of their free time together. We walked together to a restaurant on campus. A warm spell of mid-April weather had just hit Beijing, and the poplar trees lining the campus walkways had begun to shed fuzzy catkins. The fluff floated through the air like snow and blew into drifts along the sidewalks. We sneezed and laughed as we sat down at our table and picked the downy seeds out of our hair. After lunch, we went back to Yuan Yaomin's small apartment in the married teachers' campus dormitory. Her husband worked outside of the university, and her daughter was at school. As we drank tea and chatted, she pulled out some batik wrap-around skirts she'd bought on a recent trip to the south, telling us how cheaply she'd gotten them. We all took turns trying them on. Li Tianpian, who enjoyed dressing up and following the latest fashions, giggled as she strutted back and forth in the tight entryway of the two-room apartment crowded with books, paintings, and furniture. This lighthearted moment distracted from larger worries. During her short experience as a teacher, she began wondering if art really constituted much of a profession anymore. In the current economic climate, she mused, the type of painting she'd been trained in didn't bring many rewards. She felt stuck in the work-unit existence of a previous era. Before I left that day, she gave me several postcards printed with works she had completed as a graduate student. The largest, most ambitious of the works was a painting titled Red Souvenir (plate 14).

2001 年我第一次见到李天翩时，她三十一岁，已在中央民族大学绘画系任教两年。[3] 她的同事袁耀敏安排我到她们系里听课。上午在一间一年级油画材料课上度过（讲座详细讲解了各种画布制备技术的细节：动物胶、石膏底料和蛋彩），之后我与袁耀敏、李天翩一起吃午饭。她们是系里仅有的两位女性，大部分空闲时间都待在一起。我们一同走到校园里一家餐馆。四月中旬的一股暖流刚刚抵达北京，校园步道两旁的杨树开始飞絮。绒毛像雪一样在空中飘浮，在人行道上被风吹成堆。我们坐下后一边打喷嚏一边笑，从头发里挑出毛茸茸的杨絮。午饭后，我们回到袁耀敏在校园已婚教师宿舍里的小公寓。她丈夫在校外工作，女儿在上学。我们喝茶聊天时，她拿出最近去南方旅行时买的几条蜡染围裹裙，告诉我们买得多便宜。我们轮流试穿。李天翩喜欢打扮、追逐最新时尚，在这套堆满书籍、画作和家具的两居室狭窄门厅里来回走着，咯咯笑着。这个轻松的瞬间暂时掩盖了更大的忧虑。短暂的任教经历让她开始怀疑，艺术是否还算得上一种职业。她说，在当前经济环境下，她受训的那种绘画不会带来多少回报。她觉得自己被困在上一时代的工作单位生存状态中。那天离开前，她送给我几张印有她研究生时期作品的明信片。其中最大、最雄心勃勃的一幅名为《红色纪念品》（图版 14）。

In the three main canvases of Red Souvenir, each almost two meters tall, the original members of the historic women's military detachment stand in the background. Their somber, determined faces emerge in slightly blurred gray and black tones. Fragments of historical photographs and a book about the "red women" are layered in a collagelike composition on top of this backdrop. In the immediate foreground, characters from the film and ballet versions of The Red Detachment of Women appear in full color. Painted with more detailed strokes and in greater three-dimensional relief, the ballerina soldier-to-be leaps in the left-hand canvas, frozen in her iconic pose of escape from an evil tyrant. On the opposite side, her enlisted compatriot, dressed in uniform, strikes a confident stance with one hand resting at a belted waist. Li Tianpian appears in a narrower canvas, second from the left, that opens a brief space between contending versions of the historical and the legendary. In this self-portrait, she sits behind an easel with three paintbrushes in her right hand, which also gracefully holds out the outer edge of her skirt. Head cocked to the side, she looks out from behind a large canvas whose back faces the viewer.[4] She includes herself within the painting in the process of its painting, staring at the viewer in way that creates a triangle between the painter, official representation, and ghostly, layered images of the original women. Like the dramatic performers, she is painted in color, but instead of floating on the surface plane of the painting, she recedes into the perspectival space of the studio classroom where she paints. Warm light floods the background of this personal moment, the peak of her rise through the Chinese art academy system.

在《红色纪念品》的三块主画布上（每块将近两米高），历史上那支妇女军事武装最初的成员站在背景中。她们阴郁而坚定的面孔以略微模糊的灰色和黑色调浮现。历史照片的片段和一本关于“红色妇女”的书，以拼贴方式叠加在这一背景之上。最前景中，电影和芭蕾舞剧版《红色娘子军》的人物以全彩出现。舞者即将成为战士，用更细致的笔触和更强的三维立体感绘成，在左侧画布上跃起，凝固在她逃离邪恶暴君的经典姿态中。另一侧，她入伍的同伴穿着军装，一手叉腰，摆出自信姿态。李天翩出现在左起第二块较窄的画布上，在历史与传说的相互竞争的版本之间打开一小段空间。在这幅自画像中，她坐在画架后面，右手握着三支画笔，同时优雅地托起裙子的外缘。她侧着头，从一块背对观者的大画布后面望出来。[4] 她把自己画入绘画过程之中，注视观者，在画家、官方再现和历史上真实女兵幽灵般层叠的图像之间构成一个三角形。和那些戏剧演员一样，她以色彩绘成，但她没有漂浮在画面的表面，而是退入她作画的画室课堂的透视空间中。温暖的光线涌入这个个人时刻的背景，那是她在学院体系中升起的高峰。

She chose the subject matter for Red Souvenir after a trip during graduate school to Hainan Island, south of Guangdong Province, to xiesheng (paint from life). In a later conversation, she talked about what she had hoped to express in the painting. Of her time in Hainan, which in the 1990s developed into a tropical resort destination for urban Chinese tourists, she described ongoing conditions of poverty, as well as local knowledge she gained there about the original female soldiers who became legendary in the later years of Communist artistic repertoire. She spoke quickly in a casual way, punctuating her comments with laughter, even when talking about serious topics.

她是在研究生期间去广东以南的海南岛写生之后选定《红色纪念品》题材的。后来的一次谈话中，她谈到希望在这幅画中表达什么。谈到在海南的时光——1990 年代那里发展成为面向中国城市游客的热带度假胜地——她描述了持续存在的贫困状况，以及她从当地了解到的关于当年真实女兵的知识；这些女兵在后来共产党艺术剧目中成为传奇。她说话很快，语气随意，即使谈到严肃话题，也时常以笑声打断自己的话。

The story of the Red Detachment of Women is like this... at the time, they were ordinary people on the island who were oppressed by local landlords and by the Guomindang. The oppression was pretty severe. They lived under cruel conditions.

When I went there, I also found that some people still have very difficult lives. Their houses only have three walls. On the other side, there is no wall.

When I was there, I read some history that I thought was laughable. Back then, when the women joined this female troop, this anti-oppression military detachment, they entered enthusiastically with a kind of revolutionary, romantic zeal. It's just like a fashion, a trend, I think.

What's laughable is that after it was all said and done, then a lot of them married some minor officials of the Guomindang. (Laughs.) Now, in reality, if we say they were revolutionaries, then this was a betrayal of their ideals. So afterward, in a later era, when their story was propagandized, this aspect had to be hidden below, it wasn't talked about. (Laughs.) Just the beginning was told, not the end. Of course, that couldn't be mentioned.

They had this period of achievement, of the detachment's resistance. The troop had soldiers, had female commanders, all of them were female soldiers. Then this achievement was changed by the Cultural Revolution into... there was a ballet, as well as an opera... there were films, many artistic forms. Many artistic representations came out. That painting of mine portrays the imagery of these kinds of artistic forms. This is from the ballet... and these are original photographs of them on the road at the revolutionary dawn... and as they were sworn in. (Laughs.) The photographs are from their memorial hall on Hainan Island.

I just wanted to put these artistic representations side by side, and then add historical reality to the picture. To put them all together like this... Think about it, these original women when they started out were so beautiful, wearing military uniforms, with straps and supply bags crisscrossing their chests, wearing these kinds of clothes, some in dresses. They have such a valiant and heroic bearing. Then after they were captured... this picture was taken when they were in jail... they're wearing old clothes. It wasn't long after their release that they married the enemy.[5]

红色娘子军的故事是这样的……当时，她们都是岛上受当地地主和国民党压迫的普通人。压迫相当严重。她们在残酷的条件下生活。

我去的时候，也发现有些人生活仍然非常艰难。他们的房子只有三面墙，另一边没有墙。

我在那里时读了一些历史，觉得很好笑。

当年这些女性加入这支女兵队伍、这支反压迫军事部队时，是满怀一种革命、浪漫的热情进去的。我觉得就像一种时尚、一种潮流。

好笑的是，事情结束之后，她们中很多人嫁给了国民党的小官。（笑。）现在，如果我们说她们是革命者，那这是对她们理想的背叛。所以后来，在另一个时代，当她们的故事被宣传时，这一面必须被藏在下面，不能谈。（笑。）

只讲了开头，没讲结尾。当然，那不能提。

她们有这段成就，这支队伍的抵抗。队伍里有士兵，有女指挥员，全是女兵。后来这一成就被文化大革命改变成了……有芭蕾舞，也有歌剧……有电影，许多艺术形式。许多艺术再现都出来了。我那张画描绘的就是这些艺术形式的形象。这是芭蕾舞的……这些是她们在革命黎明行军时的原始照片……以及她们宣誓时的照片。（笑。）照片来自海南岛的纪念馆。

我只想把这些艺术再现并置，然后给画面加入历史现实。就这样把它们全部放在一起……

想想看，历史上这些真实的女性刚开始时多么美丽，穿着军装，带子和补给袋交叉绑在胸前，穿着这样的衣服，有些人穿裙子。她们有那样英勇豪迈的姿态。后来她们被捕……这张照片是她们在狱中拍的……她们穿着旧衣服。获释没多久，她们就嫁给了敌人。[5]

I think that when I painted it, my technique was limited, my visual range was relatively shallow, so I wasn’t able to effectively express my idea... I wasn’t able to find a more suitable means of expression. My application of color was no good. I think it should be brighter and clearer, the red accents and everything... the imagery could have been painted in a more individualistic style, with more painterly flavor, with more painterly feeling. Some places are too realistic, and then speaking of realism, other places are not realistic enough, so I’m still not very satisfied, even after completing this big painting.[6]

Li Tianpian explained that she chose to major in oil painting as an undergraduate at the art academy because of the technical difficulty. And the colors attracted her. Chinese ink painting seemed too loose and easy compared with the rigor, objectivity, and precision required for realistic oil painting.

She said Soviet-style academic realism had exerted a strong influence on Chinese oil painting over the last century. Painters who studied abroad in the Soviet Union brought this style, as well as dominant subject matter and compositional conventions, back to China.[7] She told me that the brushstrokes of this style differed from European classicism, that they were broader and blunter, more suited to propaganda needs of bold, straightforward communication. Many of her high school and university teachers subscribed to the Soviet School of painting and followed its teaching methodology.

她说，苏联式学院写实主义在过去一个世纪对中国油画产生了强烈影响。留学苏联的画家把这种风格，以及主导的题材和构图惯例带回中国。[7] 她告诉我，这种风格的笔触不同于欧洲古典主义，更宽、更钝，更适合大胆、直截了当的宣传需要。她高中和大学的许多老师都属于苏联画派，遵循其教学方法。

When I first glanced over the spring 2001 semester course schedule for the oil painting department at the Central Minorities University, where Li Tianpian and Yuan Yaomin taught, none of the offerings struck me as that different from the studio art classes I had attended as an undergraduate in the United States: materials, oil painting, sketching, figure drawing, and painting. The only surprise was that male and female figure work were divided into separate sections, as if emphasizing specialized skills needed to render anatomical difference, and the female figure section was further subdivided into "single female figure" and "double female figure" (shuang nü ti). When I expressed curiosity about these categories, Li and Yuan didn't understand why I found them so unusual. They explained that painting two figures together added another level of difficulty. When I pushed them on why "double female figure" did not have a "double male figure" equivalent on the teaching schedule, they laughed, saying they'd never thought about this question before. The only explanation they could come up with was that people preferred to look at female nudes; they were more beautiful.

我第一次查看李天翩和袁耀敏任教的中央民族大学油画系 2001 年春季课程表时，没觉得哪门课与我在美国读本科时上的绘画课有明显不同：材料、油画、素描、人体素描和绘画。唯一令人惊讶的是男女体写生被分成不同单元，仿佛是在强调描绘解剖差异所需的专门技能，而女体单元又进一步细分为“单人女体”和“双女体”（shuang nü ti）。我表达好奇时，李天翩和袁耀敏不明白我为什么觉得这很不寻常。她们解释说，把两个人体画在一起会增加一层难度。当我追问为什么课表上没有与“双女体”相对应的“双男体”时，她们笑了，说以前从未想过这个问题。她们能想到的唯一解释是，人们更喜欢看女性裸体；她们更美。

Several of the paintings Li Tianpian completed in her final year as a graduate student depict two female nudes, lying or sitting together. When I later asked her more about the rationale behind studio studies of this shuang nü ti type, she described a pedagogical method of challenging students with increasing levels of difficulty. The human figure already represents an advance beyond still life studies. Only upper level students can paint the nude figure. In the beginning, students first work at mastering the human head, often from plaster casts. Students then advance to head and torso studies, usually working from a clothed model, and then to the full figure. During their third year, they can finally sketch and paint nudes. They begin with single figures, and eventually teachers present them with studio poses involving two nude models together. Li Tianpian explained to me that the subtlety required for accurate depiction of the human form is doubled with two figures contained within a single frame. Students must also learn to deal with the tonal, spatial, and compositional relationship between the two figures: “Everything becomes more complex.” She believed that this teaching method of progressively heightened levels of technical difficulty came from the Soviet Union, as did the convention of double figure exercises. She remembered seeing some “double male figure” studies in Chinese reproductions of Soviet textbooks, and while she had also painted some of these over the course of her studies, the shuang nü ti remained the favored form.

李天翩研究生最后一年完成的几幅画描绘了两个一起躺着或坐着的女性裸体。后来我向她进一步询问课堂上这类“双女体”练习的理论依据时，她描述了用递增难度挑战学生的教学方法。人体习作已比静物习作进了一阶。只有高年级学生才能画裸体。一开始，学生先掌握头部的描绘，常以石膏像为对象，然后进阶到头部和躯干，通常使用着衣模特，再进阶到全身。到第三年，他们终于可以速写和描绘裸体。他们从单个人体开始，最终老师会布置两个裸体模特一起的课堂姿势。李天翩向我解释，在一个画面中容纳两个人体，准确描绘人体形态所需的细腻功夫便加倍。学生还必须学会处理两个人体之间的色调、空间和构图关系：“一切都变得更复杂。”她认为这种逐步提高技术难度的教学方法来自苏联，双人体练习的惯例也来自苏联。她记得在中国翻印的苏联教科书中见过一些“双男体”习作，虽然她在求学期间也画过一些，但“双女体”仍是最受青睐的形式。

This classroom exercise emphasized technical proficiency over individual modes of expression. The female bodies represented academic mastery of anatomical correctness, coloration, space, and composition. Shuang nü ti showed up in the work of several other painters I interviewed. Even for those who after graduation explored styles of painting other than realism, double female figures remained an occasional part of their vocabulary. When I asked one of these painters about her painting of two women lying together on a bed—a bold expressionist composition with bright colors and thick, loose brushstrokes—she anticipated the motivation behind my question. “Foreigners often think this series is of lesbians,” she laughed. “That’s what they see. To me, they are just shuang nü ti.”

这种课堂练习强调技术熟练而非个人表达方式。女性身体代表对解剖正确性、色彩、空间和构图的学院掌握。“双女体”也出现在我采访的其他几位画家作品中。即使那些毕业后探索写实之外绘画风格的人，双女体仍然是她们偶尔使用的语汇。当我问其中一位画家关于她画两个女人一起躺在床上的作品——一幅色彩明亮、笔触粗放的大胆表现主义构图——她预料到我问题背后的动机。“外国人常觉得这个系列是女同性恋，”她笑着说，“他们看到的就是这个。对我来说，它们只是‘双女体’。”

Li Tianpian's Classic Beauty (figure 5.01), a shuang nü ti painted one year before she completed Red Souvenir, depicts two women lying diagonally across bunched swaths of cloth on the floor. One woman, fully nude, lies on her side, with her back to the second women, clad in black bra, underwear, and stockings, who lies on her stomach. Both women have their eyes closed. Both wear watches (the models have shed their clothes, but not the time pieces that will allow them to gauge how much longer they must hold the pose; both have their arms positioned so they may easily glance at their watches). At the top of the painting, two potted ferns, placed close enough for their leaves to touch, echo the relationship of the two models. When

I asked Li Tianpian about the subject matter in this painting, she mentioned only how difficult the folds in the draperies had been to render.

李天翩的《古典美》（图 5.01）是一幅“双女体”，作于她完成《红色纪念品》前一年，描绘两个女人斜躺在地板上堆叠的布幅上。一名女子全裸侧卧，背对第二名女子；后者俯卧，穿着黑色胸罩、内裤和丝袜。两个女人都闭着眼睛，都戴着手表（模特脱去了衣服，却没有脱去计时器，以便知道还要保持这个姿势多久；她们的手臂都摆成可以轻易瞥见手表的位置）。画面上方，两盆蕨类植物靠得很近，叶子相触，呼应两位模特的关系。当我向李天翩询问这幅画的题材时，她只提到布褶有多难画。

She continued, “As a graduate student, I wanted to depart from extremely classical or traditional styles, because they have no individuality, but I don’t think I’ve succeeded.” She laughed, and then became momentarily serious and introspective. “I continually think about this problem. This issue of mine, the challenge of painting, it’s a lifelong thing, I think...”

她接着说：“读研究生时，我想摆脱极其古典或传统的风格，因为它们没有个性，但我觉得自己没成功。”她笑了，随后短暂地严肃起来，陷入内省。“我不断思考这个问题。我的这个问题，绘画的挑战，我想是一辈子的事……”

The opening image of the Shanghai film production of The Red Detachment of Women is a graphically striking woodcut print in tones of red, black, and gray (figure 5.02).[8] It depicts women in army uniform on the battlefield. They wear caps with red stars and carry red flags, pitchforks, rifles, and sickles in silhouette against a pale red sky. In a triangular composition reminiscent of Delacroix's Liberty Leading the People, a single woman rises higher than the rest on the horizon with one arm raised.[9] The following text, accompanied by a dramatic voice-over rendition of it, then appears on top of this image: "This battle story of a heroic daughter took place on Hainan Island in the south of the Motherland in 1930. That was an era of extreme suffering for Chinese people, as well as the era in which the Red Army of young workers and peasants was established."

上海电影制片厂《红色娘子军》的开场画面，是一幅红、黑、灰三色的木刻版画，视觉冲击力强烈（图 5.02）。[8] 它描绘战场上的女兵。她们戴着缀红星的帽子，扛着红旗、拿着叉、步枪和镰刀，身影映衬在淡红色天空下。在一种让人想起德拉克洛瓦《自由引导人民》的三角形构图中，一名女子高举一臂，在众人之上耸立天际。[9] 随后，这段文字伴随戏剧性的画外朗诵出现在画面上："这是英雄女儿的战斗故事，发生在祖国南方的海南岛上，时间是 1930 年。那是中国人民苦难深重的年代，也是年轻的工农红军创立的年代。"

At the beginning of the film, the heroine Wu Qionghua runs away from a household in Guomindang-controlled Coconut Village, where she serves as a slave girl. The henchmen of the tyrannical landlord Nan Batian quickly capture her. They chain her wrists to the ceiling in a basement prison and whip her, until the sympathetic eyes of a Communist spy, the dashing Hong Changqing disguised as a wealthy Overseas Chinese merchant, fall on her tortured body. He tells Nan Batian that he needs a servant and convinces the landlord to give him the troublesome Qionghua. After leaving the estate, he frees Qionghua, gives her some money for the road, and directs her toward Red Stone County, where she's heard a revolutionary women's detachment is stationed. On the way, she meets Honglian, another woman equally determined to join the detachment, and together they arrive in Red Stone Country, where the female troops perform a military review for a group of high-ranking male officials assembled on a stage above the field. As the troops file off screen, Qionghua and Honglian break through the barricade and run after them. In the next scene, a female soldier introduces them to the commanding officer of her troop.

影片开头，女主角吴琼花从国民党控制的椰林寨一户人家逃出，在那里她充当婢女。恶霸地主南霸天的爪牙很快抓住她。他们把她手腕吊在地下室牢房的天花板上鞭打，直到一名共产党侦察员同情的目光落在这具受刑的身体上——他衣着潇洒，伪装成富有的南洋华侨商人洪常青。他告诉南霸天自己需要一个仆人，说服地主把麻烦的琼花交给他。离开庄园后，他释放琼花，给她一些盘缠，指引她去红石县——她听说那里驻扎着一支革命妇女武装。路上，她遇到另一个同样决心参军的女子红莲；她们一起来到红石县。女兵们正在一片场地上接受检阅，一群男性高级官员聚集在场地高处的台上。队伍列队离开画面时，琼花和红莲冲破阻拦，追了上去。下一场中，一名女兵把她们介绍给队伍的指挥员。

Soldier Reporting that two commoners have arrived.

Commander (Walks over to Qionghua and Honglian) What are you doing here?

Qionghua We've come to be woman soldiers.

Commander Right, when we were reviewing the troops, you came in. That was very daring.

Qionghua Daring, yes, I can do anything.

Commander Proletariat class?

Qionghua (Looks around) What?

Soldier Do you have any status?

Qionghua I am a slave girl. I don't have anything.

Commander Good, you're fine. (Looks at Honglian) And you?

Honglian I also don't know if I have any status. I was sold to someone when I was ten years old.

Commander Of course that's proletariat, fine.

Soldiers (Giggling to each other) What a pity to have them... do you think their marriages have already been arranged... really!

Commander (Shushing them) Quiet down! Really! (To Qionghua and Honglian) You two go take care of formalities.

Qionghua Aren't you the commander?

Commander Yes.

Qionghua Then if you say we're in, we're in.

Commander (Quiets down the laughing soldiers again) A little more order! You need to go apply and say why you want to join.

Qionghua Why I want to join... (marches over to the commander)... you have to ask why! (She rips open the collar of her blouse to show the lash marks on her chest.) For this! To protest! To get revenge! To kill those tyrants! Cannibals! Skin them alive! I... I... (She stops speaking and covers her chest back up as the uniformed male leader Hong Changqing, no longer in his merchant disguise, walks into the scene.)

士兵　报告，来了两个老百姓。

连长（走向琼花和红莲）你们来干什么？

琼花　我们来当女兵。

连长　对，我们检阅的时候，你们闯进来了。胆子不小啊。

琼花　胆子大，我什么都敢。

连长　是无产阶级吗？

琼花（环顾）什么？

士兵　有身价吗？

琼花　我是奴隶，什么都没有。

连长　好，行。（看红莲）你呢？

红莲　我也不知道自己有没有身价。我十岁时被卖给了别人。

连长　那当然是无产阶级，行。

女兵们（相互笑）可惜她们……你们说她们的婚事是不是已经定了……真的！

连长（嘘她们）安静！真是的！（对琼花和红莲）你们两个去办手续。

琼花　你不是连长吗？

连长　是。

琼花　那你说我们行，我们就行。

连长（再次让笑的女兵安静）有点秩序！你们需要去申请，说明为什么要参加。

琼花　为什么要参加……（走到连长面前）……你还要问为什么！（她撕开上衣领口，露出胸前的鞭痕。）为了这个！要控诉！要报仇！要杀那些暴君！吃人的东西！剥他们的皮！我……我……（她停住，掩上胸口，穿军装的男领导洪常青——已不再是商人伪装——走进画面。）

In response to the female commander's instructions to apply for entry by explaining why she wants to join the Communist army, Qionghua exposes her wounds (figure 5.03). An audible ripping accompanies the visual image. In this classic cinematic take on a revolutionary moment of "speaking bitterness," the woman's body bears the marks of patriarchal feudal oppression. Her politics of exposure become pedagogical; they move the viewer to sympathy but also demonstrate Qionghua's need for political training. Under the tutelage of party leaders in the military, particularly the handsome male officer Hong Changqing, Qionghua learns through error to transform personal rage against her former master into class solidarity. After being shown a map of China and realizing that she is part of a larger, collective struggle, she devotes herself to the party. Shortly before Changqing dies a martyr to the cause, he informs Qionghua that her application to the party has been accepted. After his death, she carries his accouterments of authority—document case and pocket watch—and takes up his role as party representative.

面对女指挥员让她说明为什么参军、以便提出申请的要求，琼花露出伤口（图 5.03）。视觉图像伴有听得见的撕裂声。在这个经典的电影化“诉苦”革命时刻，女人的身体带着父权封建压迫的印记。她的暴露政治具有教育意义：既感动观者同情，也表明琼花需要政治训练。在部队里党的领导人，尤其是英俊的男军官洪常青的教诲下，琼花从错误中学习，把对旧主人的个人愤怒转化为阶级团结。在看到一幅中国地图、意识到自己是一场更大集体斗争的一部分后，她献身于党。常青为事业牺牲前不久，告诉琼花她的入党申请已被接受。他死后，她接过他象征权威的随身物件——公文包和怀表——承担起党代表的角色。

Film scholar Shuqin Cui describes Hong Changqing as a heroic, transcendent figure who "exemplifies not an individual identity but rather the sociopolitical and cinematic criteria for art production."[10] Socialist realism, a variant of modernist realism, attempted to document the experience of a collectivity, a class of people, rather than that of an individual. In its utopian ambitions, to create through cultural production a society that did not yet exist, this revolutionary class does not recognize itself as such. That was the goal of artistic creation, to generate this sense of identification and fold it into political ideology. The male communist Chang-qing serves as this figure for Qionghua (and viewers of the film), until she eventually learns to speak through his voice and, clothed in the gender-neutral uniform of the party, transcendently replaces him. In Cui's analysis, "Because of her dual identities as social victim and political alien, the repressed female subaltern is a signifying subject unable to speak up for herself, yet she embodies sociocultural meanings. As the sublime and the subaltern enter into a gendered relation, sexual difference is reduced to rhetorical indoctrination, for the task of the sublime is to teach the subaltern how to speak."[11]

电影学者崔淑琴把洪常青描述为一个英雄、超凡的人物，他“所体现的不是个人身份，而是艺术生产的社会政治与电影标准”。[10] 社会主义现实主义是现代主义现实主义的一个变体，试图记录一个集体、一个阶级的经验，而非个人的经验。在其乌托邦雄心——通过文化生产创造一个尚不存在的社会——中，这个革命阶级尚未认出自身。艺术创作的目标就是产生这种认同感，并将其纳入政治意识形态。男性共产党人常青充当琼花（以及电影观众）的这一形象，直到她最终学会通过他的声音说话，穿上党的性别中立制服，超凡地取代他。按崔淑琴的分析：“由于她具有社会受害者和政治异类的双重身份，受压抑的底层女性是一个无法为自己发声的表意主体，却又承载社会文化意义。当崇高者与底层者进入一种性别化关系时，性别差异被化约为修辞灌输，因为崇高者的任务就是教导底层者如何说话。”[11]

With each new technological development, of perspectival painting, photography, and cinema, proponents of realism have lauded their fidelity to life and facility at recording the real. (The same might be said about ethnographic data collection methods.) Postmodern theorists have, in turn, shown the lie of realism: how authoritative modes of representation interpret, persuade, and discipline. The theory of Soviet Realism adopted in China through the arts did not purport to represent the real, but rather to create the "typical" for heightened political effect. The premier issue of Meishu (Fine arts), an official art journal founded in January 1954, published the first of many monthly translations of essays on Soviet art theory. "On the Problem of the Typical in Painting" defines the "typical" as "not only the frequently seen things but those with substance which most completely and most keenly express a certain social power." The author continues, "According to Marxist-Leninism, the typical is not a sort of statistical average. The typical is the same as the substance of a certain socio-historical phenomenon; it is not simply the most common, frequently occurring, and ordinary phenomenon. Intentional exaggeration or emphasis on a phenomenon does not exclude the typical; it is a more complete exploration of it.... The question of the typical is under all circumstances a political question."[12] While the oppression of subaltern women on Hainan might have been "a sort of statistical average," embodying sociocultural meaning and revolutionary potential, they gain voice only through the typification of Qionghua's political transformation in the likeness of Changqing—an act of ventriloquism combined with a costume change.

随着透视绘画、摄影和电影等每一种新技术的发展，现实主义的拥护者都称赞其对生活的忠实以及记录现实的能力。（对民族志数据收集方法也可以这样说。）后现代理论家则反过来揭示了现实主义的谎言：权威的再现方式如何解释、说服和规训。通过艺术传入中国的苏联现实主义理论并不声称再现现实，而是为了加强政治效果创造“典型”。1954 年 1 月创刊的官方艺术杂志《美术》第一期，发表了此后每月连载的苏联艺术理论文章译文的第一篇。《论绘画中的典型问题》把“典型”定义为“不仅时常看见的事物，而且是那些最充分、最敏锐地表现某种社会力量、具有本质性的事物”。作者接着说：“根据马克思列宁主义，典型不是一种统计平均值。典型等同于某一社会历史现象的本质；它不只是最常见、最频繁发生、最普通的现象。有意夸大或强调某一现象并不排除典型；这是对典型更完整的探索……典型问题在任何情况下都是政治问题。”[12] 海南底层女性所受的压迫或许是“一种统计平均值”，承载社会文化意义和革命潜能，她们却只有通过琼花以常青形象完成的政治转变的典型化才获得声音——这是一种腹语术，加上换装。

At the film's end, Qionghua glances down at her inherited pocket watch, and the Red Detachment of Women march into the future. They sing: "March on and march on. We shoulder serious responsibilities as soldiers and embody deep enmity as women. In the past, Hua Mulan joined the army in the name of her father; today women of the detachment fight for the people." In the same line that celebrates women marching in the same uniform as men, gender difference is also reinscribed. Soldiers, joined by class grievance, shoulder serious responsibilities; women, vessel-like, embody deep enmity. Cross-dressing, in the generic mode of Hua Mulan from the mythic Chinese past, is not liberatory in a personal sense but a socially acceptable and even publicly mandated form of gender transgression for the greater social good, whether that be family or nation. The body of the woman beneath the soldier's uniform (a dialectical tension between official discourses about nannü distinction and "men and women are the same") inspires the revolutionary imperative of revenge, blood debts that must be paid in kind. She knowingly concealed, a relinquishment rather than expression of individual subjectivity, becomes a cultural symbol of establishing a new moral order. Yet at the same time, in this transgression she extends the range of what is possible, even thinkable, for women to aspire to, as revolutionaries, painters, and authors of their own image.

影片结尾，琼花低头看了一眼继承来的怀表，红色娘子军向未来行进。她们唱道："向前进，向前进。战士的责任重，妇女的冤仇深。古有花木兰替父去从军，今有娘子军扛枪为人民。"在同一句歌词赞美女性与男性穿同样制服行进的同时，性别差异也被重新铭刻。战士因阶级仇恨而联合，肩负重任；女人则像容器一样，承载深仇大恨。按照中国神话过去花木兰的类型模式，女扮男装并非个人意义上的解放，而是为了更大的社会利益——家庭或国家——被社会接受、甚至公开要求的性别越界形式。军装下的女人身体（关于男女有别和"男女都一样"的官方话语之间的辩证张力）激发革命的复仇命令，血债必须血偿。她有意隐藏身体，不是表达而是放弃个人主体性，成为建立新道德秩序的文化象征。然而与此同时，在这种越界中，她扩展了女性作为革命者、画家和自己形象作者可以追求、甚至想象的范围。

Li Tianpian, as she sits in the drag of a new era, delicately holding out the edge of her skirt, admires these discarded women in a way that jostles contemporary presumptions about what is "naturally" feminine or masculine: "Think about it, these original women when they started out were so beautiful, wearing military uniforms, with straps and supply bags crisscrossing their chests..." The Red Detachment does not represent a fixed point in time, but a shifting point of reference to critique the 1990s Chinese notion of men and women as essences that can't be changed but only played with, bought and sold on a market that demands sexed bodies to fulfill commodified forms of desire.

李天翩坐在新时代的装扮中，优雅地托起裙边，以搅动当代关于何为"天然"女性或男性的预设的方式仰慕这些被丢弃的女人："想想看，历史上这些真实的女性刚开始时多么美丽，穿着军装，带子和补给袋交叉绑在胸前……"《红色娘子军》不代表时间中的固定点，而是一个移动的参照点，用来批判 1990 年代中国关于男女本质不可改变、只能被玩弄、在市场买卖的观念——市场要求有性别的身体来满足商品化的欲望形式。

For the painter, a different order of difficulty arises at the point of learning to translate “life drawing or painting” studies (in which nudes represent the height of technical difficulty) into the “typical” of socialist or reform-era political imagery. The models in Li Tianpian’s Classic Beauty painting have been stripped of soldier uniform and appear nearly nude in another manifestation of “liberatory,” titillating feminine drag: sheer black stockings, panties, and brassiere. But this image also contains a punctum, a mundane detail that unravels its bland fantasy. The wristwatches worn by the models appear as an accident of the painter’s careful attention to the detail of what exists before her eye in the studio; they signal the tedium of the present, as the models wait for their next break and their bodies grow stiff in the pose they must hold for the painter to capture. They remind us that they have been hired to lie still, but that time does not stand still. Instead it warps in a disconcerting way, past folding into future, amplifying sacrifice, failure, reversal. The pocket watch inherited by Wu Qionghua from Hong Changqing in the filmic version of Red Detachment of Women signaled the time for coordinated military advance, toward a teleologically determined future. The wounds lashed into the woman’s flesh were covered up by a soldier’s uniform, to create a valiant bearing that made her beautiful in a typological way. Now the whitening creams of reform-era feminine beauty, or oil pigments of titanium white mixed with yellow ochre and a hint of cadmium red, smooth the wrinkles from flesh laid bare again.

对画家而言，另一层面的困难出现在学习把“人体写生”习作（其中裸体代表技术难度的顶峰）转化为社会主义或改革时期政治图像的“典型”时。李天翩《古典美》中的模特被剥去士兵制服，几乎全裸，呈现另一种“解放的”、撩人的女性装扮：透明黑丝袜、内裤和胸罩。但这幅图像也包含一个刺点，一个使平淡幻想解体的平凡细节。模特佩戴的手表显得像是画家对画室眼前存在之物细致关注的偶然产物；它们标示出当下的沉闷，模特等待下一次休息，身体在必须保持供画家捕捉的姿势中变得僵硬。它们提醒我们，她们是被雇来静止躺着的，但时间并未静止。相反，它以令人不安的方式扭曲，过去折叠进未来，放大牺牲、失败、反转。电影版《红色娘子军》中，吴琼花从洪常青那里继承的怀表，标示协同军事推进、迈向目的论所决定未来的时间。抽打在女人肉体上的伤口被军装遮盖，制造出英勇姿态，使她在类型意义上美丽。如今，改革时期女性美的美白霜，或钛白与土黄、少许镉红混合的油画颜料，抚平了再次裸露肉体上的皱纹。

In the early 1960s, Mao Zedong's wife Jiang Qing began her campaign to revolutionize the performing arts of opera, music, dance, and film. She reached the height of her influence during the Cultural Revolution by turning her attention to a realm from which she had once tried to distance herself. In 1930s Shanghai she had worked as a rising stage and screen actress at the same time as her involvement in the Communist underground as a cultural worker. In later years, critics questioned her early commitment to the party by pointing to the fame she had sought as a film star; she claimed in response that capitalistic film companies had forced her to sign exploitative contracts with them.[13] Her personal history also included bitter memories of her father's abuse of her mother, which led her mother to flee with her as a child into the position of servant in a number of households. As Jiang dedicated herself to a theater of revolutionary heroism, she explained that her focus on the arts emerged from a belief that the superstructure had fallen out of step with the economic base: it lagged behind, creating a social vulnerability that made a "capitalist restoration" possible. Jiang aimed to push the superstructure ahead, advocating ongoing class struggle through a transformation of cultural forms. This tenet of her political theorizing, adapted from Mao, that the superstructure could lead the base, reversed the usual temporality forced by orthodox analysts on these metaphorical concepts in Marx's writings. In the abstraction of base and superstructure into separate, observable segments of human activity, they were most often described as sequential, "first material production, then consciousness, then politics and culture."[14] The avant-gardism of Jiang's activism did not attempt to dissolve the boundaries between art and the everyday, as did contemporary Western theories of the avant-garde, but to propel culture to the forefront of a bid to make China the center of world revolutionary socialism.

1960 年代初，毛泽东的妻子江青开始推动戏曲、音乐、舞蹈和电影等表演艺术的革命。文化大革命期间，她把注意力转向一个曾试图与之保持距离的领域，影响力达到顶峰。1930 年代的上海，她一边作为崭露头角的舞台和银幕演员工作，一边作为文化工作者参与共产党地下活动。后来，批评者以她追求电影明星名声为由，质疑她早期对党的忠诚；她回应说，资本主义电影公司强迫她签订了剥削性合同。[13] 她的个人经历还包括父亲虐待母亲的痛苦记忆，母亲因此带着年幼的她逃离，到好几户人家当仆人。江青投身革命英雄主义剧场时解释说，她对艺术的关注源于一种信念：上层建筑已经落后于经济基础，造成社会脆弱性，使“资本主义复辟”成为可能。江青旨在推动上层建筑前进，倡导通过文化形式的转变继续阶级斗争。这一政治理论信条改编自毛泽东，即上层建筑可以先于经济基础发展，颠倒了正统分析者强加于马克思著作中这些隐喻概念的通常时间顺序。在把基础和上层建筑抽象为可观察的独立人类活动领域时，它们最常被描述为先后相继：“首先是物质生产，然后是意识，然后是政治和文化。”[14] 江青行动主义的先锋主义不像当代西方先锋理论那样试图消解艺术与日常生活的边界，而是把文化推到争取让中国成为世界革命社会主义中心的前沿。

In 1963, she began her preparations for a revolutionary model ballet based on the story of the famous Hainan Island Communist Women's Detachment. When she first spoke to the dancers at the Beijing Dance Institute, she told them that the 1961 film had been flawed but she believed in her ability to mold the narrative to express true revolutionary principles. The stage production would eventually be lauded as a realization of Mao's concept to "make the old serve the new and things foreign serve things Chinese." Jiang Qing's English-language biographer Roxanne Witke claims that this and her other model dramas also created a theater based on the theme of revenge, an emotional substratum largely ignored in doctrinaire Marxist-Leninist political theory.[15] Mao, in his "Talks at the Yan'an Conference on Literature and Art," had called for cultural workers to provoke love for the peasantry and hatred for their enemies—tyrannical landlords, Guomindang rulers, and Japanese imperialists. Jiang's theater purified vengeance, directing how and against whom it could be unleashed, replacing the terror of history's uncertainty with the inevitability of bright and shining heroics for the masses to emulate.

1963 年，她开始准备一部以海南岛著名共产党妇女武装故事为基础的革命芭蕾舞剧。她第一次对北京舞蹈学院的舞者讲话时说，1961 年的电影有缺陷，但她相信自己有能力改造叙事，表达真正的革命原则。这部舞台作品最终被誉为毛泽东“古为今用，洋为中用”理念的实现。江青的英文传记作者罗克珊·维特克（Roxanne Witke）声称，这部和其他样板戏也创造了一种以复仇为主题的剧场，这种情感基底在教条主义的马克思列宁主义政治理论中大多被忽视。[15] 毛泽东在《在延安文艺座谈会上的讲话》中曾号召文化工作者激发对农民的爱和对敌人的恨——恶霸地主、国民党统治者和日本帝国主义者。江青的剧场提纯了复仇，规定如何、向谁发泄，用群众应当效仿的光辉英雄的必然性，取代历史不确定性的恐怖。

In the ballet version of Red Detachment of Women, the heroine Qionghua ("Jade Flower") becomes Qinghua ("Clear China"). She flees on her own from the tyrant's dungeon, but his guards chase her down and whip and beat her viciously. They leave her for dead. A violent rainstorm wakes Qinghua from her stupor. She rises to dance before fainting again. The Red Army officer Hong Changqing finds her and points her on the road to revolution. When she arrives at the Red Army base, she runs forward to press her face to the flag. The members of the detachment are identified as women of the Li ethnic nationality, to further accentuate the oppression of old China against minorities. The soldiers welcome Qinghua, and she pours out her story of suffering in a dance that reenacts how she was almost beaten to death. She joins the unit and learns with the others sitting before a blackboard on which the following lesson has been written: "Only by emancipating all mankind can the proletariat achieve its own final emancipation." They overthrow the tyrant, liberate the people of Coconut Grove, and after Hong Changqing dies a defiant martyr to the cause, Qinghua declares: "Oh, Party, you rescued me from an abyss of bitterness. You raised me to maturity in the flames of class struggle. I pledge to model myself after Comrade Hong. I shall be a revolutionary and never leave the battlefield until the red flag waves over the Five Continents and Four Seas!"

在芭蕾版《红色娘子军》中，女主角吴琼花（“玉花”）变成清华（“清朗的中国”）。她独自逃出暴君的地牢，却遭到他的卫兵追捕，被残酷鞭打。他们把她丢下等死。一场猛烈的暴雨使清华从昏迷中醒来。她起身舞蹈，又昏了过去。红军军官洪常青发现她，指引她走上革命道路。她到达红军根据地时，跑上前把脸贴在红旗上。娘子军成员被设定为黎族妇女，以进一步强调旧中国对少数民族的压迫。战士们欢迎清华，她在一段再现自己如何几乎被打死的舞蹈中倾诉苦难经历。她加入部队，和其他人一起坐在写有如下教导的黑板前学习：“无产阶级只有解放全人类，才能最后

解放自己。”她们推翻暴君，解放椰林寨人民；洪常青为事业英勇牺牲后，清华宣誓：“党呵，是您把我从苦海里救出来，是您在阶级斗争的风雨中把我培育成长。我立志做洪常青那样的革命者，永远跟着党，永远干革命，直到红旗插遍五洲四海！”

The choreography drew elements from classical ballet as it had been introduced to China in the 1950s by Russian ballet instructors and from Chinese opera. This synthesis of movements drawn from two bourgeois repertoires was used to advocate proletariat heroes. In particular, female dancers made a sharp break from the fragile, feminine movements of the past, and the poor, working classes were represented as strong and positive rather than vulgar. Jiang Qing attended to details as fine as the art of patching. Worn work clothes of proletarian characters could not appear plain or shabby through “plain realism” or sloppy patches. Jiang directed the company tailors to craft beautiful costumes that represented hardship artistically. In Red Detachment of Women (figure 5.04), long black whip lashes are painted across the legs, arms, chest, and back of the red silk outfit worn by Qinghua when she flees from the tyrant. They no longer mark the flesh.

Since 1963, the China Ballet Troupe had performed this ballet and this ballet alone. The script for the scene in which Qinghua tells her story of suffering to the Red Detachment presents the action as follows.

The company Commander notices the welts on her arms and asks her about herself. For generations Qinghua's family suffered bloody oppression. Fury wells up in her heart. She pours out the story of the crimes of the Tyrant of the South.

(Solo dance.)

She pulls up her sleeves and reveals the whip marks covered with blood. (She does "ce shen xi tui," "zhan chi dun zhuan" and "bei shen gui bu.")[17] She tells of the tortures she endured in the Tyrant's dungeon. (From "pang yue bu—jeté fermé" she turns to "zu jian bing li—soutenu en tournant." In the "zao xing" she shows how she was chained in the Tyrant's dungeon.) She tells how she was nearly beaten to death by the Tyrant in the coconut grove. (She does "tan hai fan she" and expresses her fury in "liang xiang.")[18]

Hong points out the cruelties inflicted on Qinghua's family for generations as a lesson to the soldiers and peasants, saying:

"Her suffering is ours. Her hatred is ours. Slaves must arise. But only by taking up guns and waging revolution under the guidance of our great leader Chairman Mao and the Chinese Communist Party can we win a new world and liberate hundreds of millions of suffering people." (He does "xi tui da tiao," and "kong zhuan—tour en l'air" and performs "liang xiang" with an arm extended.)

On February 22, 1972, President Richard Nixon viewed a performance of The Red Detachment of Women in Beijing. When he asked Jiang Qing to tell him the name of the director, she replied that it had been created by the masses. The follow day, the New York Times ran a commentary on the ballet. The reviewer noted the accomplished achievement of ballet in China since it was first imported twenty years earlier when the Minister of Culture Mao Dun arranged for some of the best Bolshoi teachers to teach in Beijing. “Whatever the Chinese may feel toward the Russians nowadays, one debt of gratitude (two, if you include the atomic bomb) remains. It was the Russians who made it possible for the Chinese to combine toe slippers and rifles, and with splendid effect.”[19] The National Broadcasting Company aired a film version of the revolutionary model ballet on U.S. television on March 12, 1972.

1972 年 2 月 22 日，理查德·尼克松总统在北京观看《红色娘子军》演出。当他请江青告诉他导演的名字时，她回答说这是群众创作的。第二天，《纽约时报》发表了一篇关于这部芭蕾的评论。评论者指出，自二十年前文化部长茅盾安排一些最好的莫斯科大剧院教师来京任教、芭蕾首次传入中国以来，中国取得了精湛成就。“无论中国人如今对俄国人是什么感情，仍欠着一笔感激（如果算上原子弹，就是两笔）。是俄国人使中国人能够把足尖鞋和步枪结合起来，而且效果极好。”[19] 1972 年 3 月 12 日，美国全国广播公司在美国电视上播放了这部革命样板芭蕾的电影版。

Qinghua steps out to take her bow in a new incarnation as international ambassador. Did Nixon grasp the symbolic importance of Hainan, an island nearly the size of Taiwan, which the Communists had liberated only in April 1950, after the Americans chose not to back the Nationalists in their claim to the territory? Amid Cold War tongue-in-cheek rhetoric about bombs and ballet slippers, Qinghua’s leap onto U.S. television screens signaled the future transfer of diplomatic recognition from Taipei to Beijing, under Jimmy Carter in 1979.

清华以国际大使的新化身走出来谢幕。尼克松是否领会了海南岛的象征意义？这个面积几乎与台湾相当的岛屿，直到 1950 年 4 月才被共产党解放，此前美国选择不支持国民党对该领土的主张。在关于炸弹和芭蕾鞋的冷战半开玩笑修辞中，清华跃上美国电视屏幕，预示着 1979 年吉米·卡特任内美国外交承认将从台北转向北京。

A month after we first met, Li Tianpian and I chatted in her small room at the Central Minorities University. I'd gone that morning to her life drawing class to sketch together with her students. She had also set up an easel in the classroom to work on a study of the model. She lived in an older two-story dormitory in a forgotten corner of campus, behind a dusty cordoned-off site where workers were constructing a new classroom building. As we sat on her mattress on the floor, leaning our backs against the cool plaster wall, she told me about her youth.

我们第一次见面一个月后，李天翩和我在中央民族大学她的小房间里聊天。那天早晨我去了她的人体写生课，和她的学生一起画速写。她也在教室里支起画架，画一幅模特习作。她住在校园一个被遗忘角落的旧两层宿舍里；宿舍前是一片尘土飞扬、被围起来的工地，工人们正在那里建造新教学楼。我们坐在她铺在地板上的床垫上，背靠着冰凉的灰泥墙，她向我讲述自己的青年时代。

She grew up in the large northern industrial city of Shenyang in Liaoning Province. During the 1970s and 1980s, her father worked as a designer for a synthetic textile factory. It was a large light industry enterprise, like one of the many state-owned enterprises in the northeast region, each of which could employ up to tens of thousands of people. Her father designed advertisements, trade show materials, clothing, and brand logos. As early as the 1980s, when his work unit really prospered, he wore white dress shirts and flew on planes for business trips, especially to the south, where he served as a textile factory technical consultant. She remembered the gifts—rationed meat and fruit and piles of books—he brought back from his trips. And the benefits provided by the work unit were undeniably good.

她在北方工业大城辽宁沈阳长大。1970 和 1980 年代，她父亲在一家合成纺织厂当设计师。那是大型轻工业企业，像东北地区许多国有企业一样，每家可能雇用数万人。她父亲设计广告、展会材料、服装和品牌标识。早在 1980 年代，他的单位真正繁荣时，他穿着白色衬衫，乘飞机出差，尤其是去南方，在那里担任纺织厂技术顾问。她记得他出差带回来的礼物——定量供应的肉和水果，还有成堆的书。工作单位提供的福利无可否认地好。

She liked drawing from a very young age. The kindergarten attached to the work unit had dedicated teachers who encouraged her to draw and paint, and she produced pictures—of Tiananmen Square, chickens, cars, and jeeps, she especially liked jeeps—to gain their praise. She attended a key elementary school, where the teachers entered her in all sorts of contests and exhibits. Her mother taught English at a middle school, and she asked one of the art teachers there to tutor Tianpian and her younger sister at his home, which he did for free. Comparing socialist ethics of communality with today's market-driven social relations, Li Tianpian noted, "People were just like that back then. Today things are different. If I were to tutor you, we'd discuss how much for each class session, it's very clear, one class, eighty, one hundred, whatever. Back then if a teacher saw you were a good kid, even if you weren't in his class or school, just a friend's child... well, he had a feeling of responsibility and would want to teach you. Teachers then were like that, they really didn't think in terms of remuneration, but would just let you go to their house every day to paint." This teacher eventually took her to the local government-run Young Pioneer Palace, which provided free art classes with expert teachers. She attended classes there every weekend with students of many different ages. During winter and summer vacations, they took trips out of the city to draw from life. Her mother spent all of her money so that Tianpian could take trips to places like Mount Tai. She entered more contests and exhibits and started winning prizes. She laughed, "I had a big pile of awards.... I was really proud of myself, thought I was really something."

她从小就喜欢画画。单位附属幼儿园里尽心尽责的老师鼓励她画画，她画天安门广场、鸡、汽车和吉普车——她特别喜欢吉普车——来赢得表扬。她上了重点小学，老师让她参加各种比赛和展览。她母亲在一所中学教英语，请那里的一位美术老师辅导天翩和妹妹；老师在自己家里免费教她们。李天翩比较社会主义的共同体伦理与今天市场驱动的社会关系时说："那时的人就是这样。现在不同了。如果我给你辅导，我们会商量每节课多少钱，很清楚，一节课八十、一百，随便。那时，老师要是看出你是个好孩子，即使你不是他班上的、不是他学校的，只是朋友的孩子……他就有一种责任感，想教你。那时的老师就是这样，真的不考虑报酬，就是让你每天去他家画画。"这位老师最终把她带到当地政府办的少年宫，那里有专家教师免费上美术课。她每个周末和许多不同年龄的学生一起上课。寒暑假，他们出城写生。母亲花光所有钱，让天翩去泰山等地旅行。她参加更多比赛和展览，开始获奖。她笑着说："我有一大堆奖……我特别自豪，觉得自己真了不起。"

She tested effortlessly into a key middle school and also started attending after-school classes at the Lu Xun Academy of Fine Arts, located near her home in Shenyang. These classes offered university entrance exam coaching for students who wanted to test into art academies. At twelve years old, she was one of the youngest students, and she watched as the older students—some from technical or art schools—tried to pass the fiercely competitive entrance exam. Many tried year after year without passing before they finally gave up. Some did very well on the art section, but couldn't get high enough scores on the general humanities exam. In her second year of middle school, she met a girl who had tested into the attached high school of the Central Academy in Beijing and gave her the idea to register for the exam the following year. She passed it easily.

她轻松考进一所重点中学，也开始在沈阳家附近的鲁迅美术学院上课后班。这些班为想考美术学院的学生提供高考辅导。十二岁时，她是最年轻的学生之一，看着年纪更大的学生——有些来自中专或美术学校——努力通过竞争激烈的入学考试。许多人年复一年考不上，最终放弃。有些人的美术部分考得很好，却无法在文化课考试中取得足够高的分数。中学二年级时，她遇到一个考进北京中央美术学院附中的女孩，萌生了下一年报考的念头。她轻松通过。

In 1985, she moved to Beijing, where she spent three years at the high school run by the Central Academy of Fine Arts. When she first arrived, the behavior and dress of some of the older students shocked her. In contrast with the neat school uniform she'd grown up wearing, they dressed casually in the latest city fashions. They danced disco, listened to Michael Jackson and Madonna, and had multiple boyfriends. Gradually she adapted to life at the school, where most of them also lived, but about certain things, especially romance and sex, she felt she had a deep-rooted traditionalism. Their schedule was divided into half days of regular subjects and half days of art classes. In the beginning, she really liked sculpture, but eventually decided to specialize in oil painting. It was one of the most difficult courses to test into at an art academy. In her third year, she registered for the university exam, and again easily tested into the China Academy of Art in Hangzhou.

1985 年，她搬到北京，在中央美术学院附属高中读了三年。刚到时，一些年长学生的行为和穿着让她震惊。与她从小穿的整洁校服形成对比，他们穿着随意，追逐最新城市时尚。他们跳迪斯科，听迈克尔·杰克逊和麦当娜，同时交好几个男朋友。她逐渐适应了这所大部分人也住校的学校生活，但在某些事情上，尤其是爱情和性，她觉得自己有一种根深蒂固的传统主义。课程安排是半天普通科目、半天美术课。起初她很喜欢雕塑，最终决定专攻油画。那是美术学院最难考进的课程之一。第三年，她报名高考，再次轻松考进杭州的中国美术学院。

She entered the academy in the fall of 1988 as the youngest of thirteen students in the first-year oil painting class. New ideas, trends, and exhibits had begun to explode onto the art scene; suddenly everyone seemed to have their own styles. She recalled that she and her classmates spent all of their time enthusiastically reading, thinking, discussing. When the student movement in the spring of 1989 began gaining nationwide momentum, she joined other students in the streets. But she was young; she said she didn't really understand the political situation and just went along like a child going to see the excitement, like an observer of a theatrical production. Classes had come to a standstill. Her parents urged her not to participate in the protests. After June 4, when the central government shut down communication and transportation lines between north and south, she grew frightened. She thought if regular travel weren't resumed, she wouldn't be able to see her family. If a war broke out, her life would be ruined.

1988 年秋，她入学，成为油画系一年级十三名学生中最年轻的一个。新观念、新潮流、新展览开始爆发于艺术界；突然每个人似乎都有自己的风格。她回忆说自己和同学把所有时间都热情地用于阅读、思考、讨论。1989 年春学生运动在全国获得势头时，她和其他学生一起走上街头。但她还年轻；她说自己并不真正理解政治局势，只是像孩子看热闹一样随大流，像戏剧演出的旁观者。课程停摆。父母劝她不要参加抗议。六四之后，中央政府切断南北通讯和交通，她害怕起来。她想，如果正常交通不恢复，她就见不到家人；如果爆发战争，她的人生就毁了。

"Let's not talk about this anymore," she told me. "My life in university was really ideal." She graduated after four years, one of the eight students left in their original class of thirteen and one of only two women. A few had dropped out. Two had gone to Russia. She moved back to Shenyang where she had been assigned to the city's Cultural Center (wenhua guan). She didn't like this unstructured lifestyle; she felt aimless, with no pressure or inspiration. She received assignments to teach master classes at various places around the city. She painted on her own, but soon she decided she wanted to continue her studies. A national rule stipulated that after two years of work, one could apply to graduate school. But after two years the director of the Cultural Center refused to give her permission. Whatever he said stood, and she felt confused and paralyzed. She panicked, thinking she would spend her life buried in a place surrounded by people who came to work to read the newspaper and drink tea. She took on some work at an advertising agency, but this lifestyle did not appeal to her either. Her bosses and customers treated her like a girl rather than a talented designer. They expected her to stay out late at night to accompany them at banquets. She described her repulsion at having to greet new clients who held onto her hand for too long. She quit. After four years at the Cultural Center, the director retired, and she immediately registered for the graduate school exam. Again, she passed all of the hurdles smoothly and returned to Hangzhou.

"我们别谈这个了，"她对我说，"我的大学时光真的很理想。"四年后她毕业，原来十三人的班上只剩八人，她是仅有的两名女生之一。几人退学，两人去了俄罗斯。她回到沈阳，被分配到市文化馆。她不喜欢这种没有结构的生活方式；她觉得没有目标，没有压力，也没有灵感。她接受安排，到城里各处教授大师班。她自己画画，但很快决定想要继续深造。国家规定，工作两年后才能报考研究生。但两年后，文化馆馆长拒绝放她走。他说了算，她感到困惑，束手无策。她惊恐地想到，自己会一辈子埋没在这个地方，周围都是上班看报喝茶的人。她在一家广告公司找了点活，但这种生活也不吸引她。老板和客户把她当小姑娘，而不是有才华的设计师。他们希望她熬夜陪宴。她描述自己不得不迎接新客户、对方久久拉着她的手时的厌恶。她辞职了。在文化馆工作四年后，馆长退休，她立刻报考研究生。她再次顺利通过所有关卡，回到杭州。

Since receiving her master's degree and moving to Beijing to teach at the Central Minorities University, she tried, unsuccessfully in her own opinion, to leave behind the classical, realist style that enabled her to test into progressively advanced levels of the official art education system. But she also struggled with a sense that oil painting didn't really matter in the new economy. She reflected on a spiritual reversal, in which material practicality now mattered more than anything else, with those in the arts privileging design. She lamented, "In the past some poets really gained people's worship, poets, writers, painters. But not anymore. Now they worship people who are financially successful, who have high social and economic standing.... Sometimes I think about what my function in society is. For example, I have continued to teach students, to teach them to follow the road I've taken. When I educate them, when I guide them, it's not with the same lofty ideals I used to have. I can no longer tell them that to be a painter, to be an artist, to devote oneself to art is really worth pursuing." Laughing with resignation, she concluded, "I used to think I was more accomplished than other people, I wanted to take the hardest tests and go to the best schools. But suddenly I realized that society had stealthily changed. I already wasn't so remarkable. I'd become that kind of person on the margins of society, a painter."

获得硕士学位、搬到北京在中央民族大学任教后，她试图摆脱那种使她逐级考进官方美术教育体系的古典写实风格，但按她自己的说法，没有成功。她也挣扎于一种感觉：油画在新经济中并不真正重要。她反思一种精神反转：物质实用如今比什么都重要，艺术界人士则推崇设计。她哀叹："过去有些诗人真的受到人们崇拜，诗人、作家、画家。现在不再如此。现在他们崇拜经济成功、社会和经济地位高的人……有时我会想我在社会中的功能是什么。比如，我一直在教学生，教他们走我走过的路。当我教育他们、引导他们时，已经不再带着过去那种崇高理想。我再也不能告诉他们，当画家、当艺术家、献身艺术真正值得追求。"她无奈地笑着总结："我曾觉得自己比别人有成就，想考最难的试，上最好的学校。但突然意识到，社会已经悄悄改变。我已经不那么出众。我成了那种处在社会边缘的人——一个画家。"

A parallel runs between the way she narrated her life as an art student and teacher and how she reflected on the life course of her parents. She described the feeling of success and accomplishment her father had when his factory reached the height of its production. Eventually his position (ironically, he was a designer, but for a state-run company) fell victim to the privatization drive of the 1990s. She told the denouement of their story, "But now, the national enterprises have all gone under, everyone is laid off, and his heart often cannot bear it. In fact, when things first started to turn bad, he got sick for a while. He can't accept this reality psychologically. The two of them, my father and mother's generation, night and day, they offered up their lives. Sometimes I really think about it, I don't want to do the same."

她讲述自己作为艺术学生和教师的经历，与她反思父母的人生轨迹之间存在平行。她描述父亲在工厂生产达到顶峰时的成功感和成就感。最终，他的职位（讽刺的是，他是一名设计师，但在一家国营公司）成为 1990 年代私有化浪潮的牺牲品。她讲述他们故事的结局："但现在，国有企业都垮了，大家都下岗，他心里常常承受不了。其实，事情刚开始变坏时，他病了一阵。他在心理上无法接受这个现实。他们那一代，我父亲和母亲，日日夜夜奉献了一生。有时我真的想到这些，就不想重蹈覆辙。"

In an attempt to find a way out of her current situation, she frequently turned to the topic of marriage. She longed to leave behind her cramped teacher's dorm room, without its own kitchen or bathroom, where painted canvases rested against bookshelves and bars covered the sole window. At thirty-one, she felt like she was getting too old to stay single. Three of her friends from school all got married around the same time a few years ago. She really envied them at the time, but now all of them are divorced. One of them had a husband who drank and gambled and beat her, but they got to the United States before she divorced him. The husband of another often left home for long business trips, and they gradually grew apart. The third left her husband for one of his friends who helped her apply to study abroad in England. If she got married, she would have better housing, but she still harbored the ideal of finding someone she would want to stay with for life.

为了摆脱当前处境，她经常转向婚姻话题。她渴望离开那间没有独立厨房和卫生间、画布靠书架立着、唯一窗户装有铁栏的狭小教师宿舍。三十一岁的她觉得自己单身太久。学生时代的三个朋友几年前几乎同时结婚。当时她真羡慕她们，但现在都离婚了。其中一个的丈夫酗酒、赌博还打她，但她在离婚前已经到了美国。另一个的丈夫经常长期出差，两人渐渐疏远。第三个离开丈夫，投向丈夫一个朋友的怀抱，后者帮她申请去英国留学。如果结婚，她会有更好的住房，但她仍怀有找到一个愿与之共度一生的人的理想。

Her other option for attaining a more comfortable life was learning to paint the kinds of paintings that sell well. She had sold a few paintings, studio still life and figure paintings, through a Taiwanese gallery. She planned to look around galleries more to try to understand what did well on the market. She claimed that she had grown up and realized the significant difference between men and women. She felt she didn't have enough physical strength to do the work required, to do enough research, to paint large paintings without wearing herself out. Even though she used to be able to do all these things without a problem, she convinced herself now that it was men's work.

获得更舒适生活的另一个选择，是学会画畅销的画。她通过一家台湾画廊卖过几幅画，画室静物和人物。她打算多逛画廊，了解市场上什么卖得好。她声称自己长大了，意识到男女之间的重大差异。她觉得自己没有足够的体力完成所需工作，做足够的研究，画大画而不把自己累垮。尽管她过去做所有这些都毫无问题，她现在却让自己相信那是男人的工作。

We sat again on Li Tianpian's mattress on the floor toward the end of that summer. The lights were turned off to keep the room cooler. Sweat beaded our faces as we ate popsicles and watched a line of ants crawling up the wall. She told me it wasn't worth trying to stop their invasion. I asked about the man she was dating when I last saw her. She looked a little annoyed and told me she no longer seemed able to attract him. When she called him, he didn't answer. When he finally returned her call a few days later, he gave a vague excuse. She sighed and said he didn't seem serious about her. He only wanted to hang out in her room, talking or holding her. She thought they should go out sometimes. It was weird that he only wanted to come to her room, like he didn't want to be seen in public together.

那个夏天快结束时，我们又坐在李天翩铺在地板上的床垫上。为了凉快，灯关着。我们吃着冰棍，看一队蚂蚁爬上墙，汗珠挂在脸上。她告诉我，阻止它们入侵不值得。我问起上次见面时她正在交往的那个男人。她显得有点恼火，说她似乎再也吸引不了他。她打电话他不接。几天后他终于回电话，给了一个含糊的借口。她叹口气，说他对她不认真。他只想待在她房间里聊天或抱她。她觉得他们有时应该出去。他只想来她房间，这很奇怪，好像不愿被人看见他们在一起。

She felt self-conscious. Most people thought she should be married at her age, but she didn't want to get married just for better housing. If she remained single and a teacher at the university, her quality of life would not improve significantly. She said she didn't want much, just an apartment big enough for her parents to come stay with her and enjoy life in Beijing when they wanted. "Are Americans like this," she asked me, "do they think about repaying their parents later in life? I don't want much."

她感到不自在。大多数人认为她这个年纪应该结婚，但她不想仅为改善住房而结婚。如果保持单身，继续当大学教师，她的生活质量不会显著改善。她说自己要求不多，只想有一套足够大的公寓，让父母想来时能和她住在一起，享受北京生活。“美国人会这样吗？”她问我，“他们会在以后的人生里想着报答父母吗？我的要求不多。”

She had asked me to come over that day because she wanted to talk about what it would take to study in the United States. We discussed the need for her to improve her English skills. She had been accepted for a two-month artist residency at the well-known Vermont Studio Center, where she had also been given a fellowship to cover studio and living expenses. I translated the information they sent her and helped her fill out various forms. She asked what museums she should go to see in New York if her visa for the trip came through. A few of her classmates now lived in New York, where they got by painting portraits for hire. They'd told her that in a good month, they could make two to three thousand dollars. I watched her calculate the figures in her head. She concluded that if she scrimped and could save a thousand dollars a month, she would have to work for three years like this to accumulate enough for an apartment in Beijing.

那天她请我来，是想谈谈去美国学习需要什么。我们讨论了她需要提高英语。她已被著名的佛蒙特工作室中心（Vermont Studio Center）为期两个月的艺术家驻留项目录取，并获得覆盖画室和生活费用的奖学金。我翻译了对方寄给她的材料，帮她填写各种表格。她问如果旅行签证获准，到纽约应该去看哪些博物馆。她的几个同学现在住在纽约，靠画肖像为生。他们告诉她，行情好的月份能挣两三千美元。我看她在心里算账。她得出结论，如果省吃俭用，每月存一千美元，就得这样工作三年，才能攒够在北京买一套公寓的钱。

Although I kept the postcard of Li Tianpian's painting Red Souvenir taped to the wall over my desk, I was never able to see the four large canvases of the original work. With no space to keep it in her room, she had stored it away in a school warehouse. Reduced from its monumental size to an easily circulated postcard, the women it depicted might be privately viewed and easily forgotten. However, over the months I gradually got to know Li Tianpian better, its layered imagery stuck in my mind. It contained within its frame a history of Chinese art academy oil painting, discontinuities between reality and representation, and Li Tianpian's place in a national history signified and resignified through practices of visualizing women's bodies. How could the Red Detachment women have married the enemy? How laughable, this revolutionary romance thrown off like an old set of clothes. How could she now feel that, as a woman, she didn't have enough physical strength to paint large paintings without wearing herself out, and yet consider painting foreigners' portraits for three years?

虽然我把李天翩《红色纪念品》的明信片一直贴在我书桌上方的墙上，却始终没能看到原作的四块大画布。她房间里没有存放空间，只好把画存到学校仓库。从纪念碑式的尺寸缩减为便于流通的明信片，画中女性可能被私下观看，也容易被遗忘。然而，随着几个月过去，我逐渐更了解李天翩，它层叠的意象始终留在我脑海里。它的画框内包含中国学院油画史、现实与再现之间的断裂，以及李天翩在一部通过女性身体视觉化实践而被意指和重新意指的民族历史中的位置。红色娘子军的女人们怎么可能嫁给敌人？多么可笑，这种革命浪漫主义像一套旧衣服一样被抛掉。她如今怎么会觉得自己作为女人没有足够体力画大画而不累垮，却又考虑画三年外国人肖像？

I had just emerged from the subway at the end of October 2001 when I got a call from Li Tianpian on my cell phone. Amid the noise of the street, I heard her bright laughter on the other end as she asked me if I knew that it was the American holiday Halloween. She invited me to go to a disco with her that night. Some of her friends who went to the Halloween party the previous year had a great time. They dressed up in crazy outfits and danced with all of the foreigners there.

2001 年 10 月底，我刚从地铁出来，手机就响起李天翩的来电。在街道的噪音中，我听到电话那头她爽朗的笑声，她问我知不知道当天是美国的万圣节。她邀请我当晚和她一起去迪斯科。她的一些朋友去年参加万圣节派对，玩得很开心。他们穿着疯狂服装，和那里所有外国人跳舞。

I begged off saying I'd been feeling tired lately. Since our last meeting, I'd gone back to the United States for a short trip. I suggested we get together soon because I had something I wanted to give her. I'd brought back a small present for her, a map of art museums in New York. She said something about still not having enough money for her plane ticket, but we'd talk more soon. I promised to call, and then we hung up.

Her Halloween phone call reminded me of the funny story she told me about first arriving in Beijing from Shenyang to attend high school. The class above hers had organized a welcome party. They held it at night in one of the classrooms. They put on music and started doing what she called "disco dance." Then they turned the lights off and continued dancing. She stood there in her old school uniform thinking, "What are they doing?" When she got back to her room, she wrote in her diary that these students were a "host of demons dancing wildly."

Li Tianpian had successfully gotten a visa to the United States, but hadn't been able to get together the money for a plane ticket. She managed to reschedule her residency at the Vermont Studio Center for a later time. In late November, she went out with a male friend. She was worried about still being unmarried in her thirties, and many friends had started setting up dates for her. Her date was driving. They left Beijing for the nearby countryside to take photos. There was an accident. They both died in the crash on November 24. Yuan Yaomin whispered to me that this was the date of her original visa for the United States.

李天翩成功拿到美国签证，却凑不齐机票钱。她设法把佛蒙特工作室中心的驻留推迟到更晚。11 月下旬，她和一位男性朋友外出。她担心自己三十多岁仍未婚，许多朋友开始给她安排相亲。她的相亲对象开车。他们离开北京去附近乡下拍照。发生了车祸。两人都在 11 月 24 日的撞车中丧生。袁耀敏低声对我说，那正是她原定赴美签证的日期。

After I heard this news, I walked around in a daze for an hour or more. The gallery I'd gone to for the exhibition stood in section of Beijing that, like many others, was in the middle of being razed. I walked along the ruins of what had once been the southern edge of the old city wall. I could already see more of the ruined wall than a few months before. The ramshackle one-story dwellings that had once butted up three deep against the wall had been reduced to piles of bricks, garbage, and dry dirt. When I had walked along this stretch of road a year or half a year earlier, I'd watched people hanging their clothes out to dry on wire lines strung between trees and noticed the even spacing of the bricks weighing down tar paper on the roofs. The remaining rubble now struck me as one of the city's many open wounds, an injury made temporarily manifest, that would soon be covered up with shiny glass and chrome, like the high-rise office and shopping complexes across the street.

听到这个消息后，我恍惚地走了一个多小时。我去看展览的那家画廊位于北京一个像许多其他地方一样正在被夷平的区域。我沿着旧城墙南缘的废墟走，那城墙曾经矗立。我已经能看到比几个月前更多的残墙。曾经紧贴城墙、纵深三排的破旧平房，已经化为砖堆、垃圾和干土。一年或半年前，我走在这段路上时，看见人们把衣服晾在树间拉起的铁丝上，注意到压住屋顶油毡纸的砖块间距均匀。如今剩下的瓦砾让我觉得是这座城市许多敞开的伤口之一，一种暂时显现的损伤，很快就会被闪亮的玻璃和铬合金覆盖，就像街对面高层办公和商业综合体那样。

My mind turned to a traffic accident I had recently witnessed near my apartment. A woman lay on the inclined side of an exit ramp from the second ring road, with a crumpled bicycle next to her. She lay on her back, with the glasses on her face bumped at an awkward angle. Vomit ran from her half-open mouth across her cheek and onto her chest. The police had begun drawing a white line around her body.

我的思绪转向最近在我公寓附近目睹的一场交通事故。一个女人躺在二环路出口匝道的斜坡上，旁边是一辆压扁的自行车。她仰面躺着，脸上的眼镜歪成别扭的角度。呕吐物从她半张的嘴里流过脸颊，落到胸口。警察已经开始在她身体周围画白线。

It was hot and dusty. The sky was heavy with clouds and pollution. It wouldn't start raining for several more hours. All I had were my rambling questions on tape and her cheerful voice trying to respond to my inquiry into her career as an artist.

When I first explained my research to Li Tianpian, she told me my study would possess objectivity; I would recognize things that she could not. All I have are small fragments, symbols of outdated, bankrupt glory and idealism, and her hopeful laughter. The latter, her story, resists the social scientist's task of analysis. I want only to do justice, to memorialize in a tableau vivant of costumed figures, each in the drag of its own era, the failed heroics of history, which layered together may communicate something about what gets suppressed at the moment of representation. What remains unrepresentable in heroic figuration.

第一次向李天翩解释我的研究时，她告诉我，我的研究会有客观性；我会认出她认不出的东西。我所有的只是一些小碎片，过时、破产的荣耀与理想主义的象征，以及她满怀希望的笑声。后者，她的故事，抗拒社会科学家分析的任务。我只想做到公正，用一组身着各自时代装扮的人物活人画来纪念历史上失败的英雄主义；层叠在一起，它们或许能传达在再现时刻被压抑的东西。英雄形象中无法再现的东西。

Picking her way through a ruined landscape of representation, Li Tianpian painted the Red Detachment in the wake of their rise and fall, recuperating their image even though it must be read through everything that has happened since: the political excesses of the Cultural Revolution; China's bid to "link tracks" not with world socialism but transnational capitalism; the transformation of the state art system that trained her; and the emergence of a postsocialist allegory about how socialism repressed "natural" gender with its androgynous representations. Meanwhile, Li Tianpian struggled with the revaluation of art in China according to an international market, in which her representational skills had become marginal. She calculated how she might get by in a rapidly changing society: by either attracting an entrepreneur as a marriage partner or learning to paint the kinds of paintings that would sell well. She was bothered not necessarily by how art misrepresents, but by how mundane reality is when you slip behind the scenes of the typical and end up marrying the enemy.

李天翩在再现的废墟景观中择路而行，在红色娘子军起落之后描绘她们，修复她们的形象，尽管这形象必须通过此后发生的一切来解读：文化大革命的政治过激行为；中国寻求“接轨”的对象不是世界社会主义，而是跨国资本主义；培养她的国家艺术体制转型；以及一种后社会主义寓言的出现——社会主义如何以其中性化的形象再现压抑“自然”性别。与此同时，李天翩挣扎于按国际市场对中国艺术重新估价，她赖以生存的再现技能在其中已被边缘化。她盘算如何在一个迅速变化的社会中生存：要么吸引一位企业家作为婚姻伴侣，要么学会画畅销的画。困扰她的未必是艺术如何错误再现，而是当你溜到典型的幕后、最终嫁给敌人时，平凡现实是何等模样。

The narrow addition of her self-portrait, dividing a space between those red women of the past, salvages them from a fate of becoming discardable national kitsch, the kind especially enjoyed by foreign tourists, and turns their twentieth-century pageant into a play of sorrow rather than nostalgia. Her presence within turns the image into something doubled-edged: an intensified collection of ideals passionately pursued, a repository of utopian dream, inevitably flattened into heart-breaking two-dimensionality. The cult of individual authorship steps out in the guise of privatization and market economics. Her style slides sideways out of time. The superstructure again appears to lag behind the base. Naturalized gender competes with class as a meaningful social category. Art and marriage alike shimmer like commodities and promise access to the world.

她自画像的窄小增补，在过去那些红色女性之间分出一片空间，把她们从沦为可丢弃的民族媚俗品——外国游客尤其喜欢的那种——的命运中抢救出来，把她们二十世纪的华彩演出变成一出悲伤而非怀旧的戏剧。她的在场使图像变得双刃：一份被热情追求的理想的强化集合，一个乌托邦梦想的仓库，不可避免地压扁为令人心碎的二维。个人作者身份的崇拜以私有化和市场经济的伪装登场。她的风格侧滑出时间。上层建筑再次显得落后于基础。自然化的性别与阶级竞争作为有意义的社会范畴。艺术和婚姻都像商品一样闪光，许诺通往世界。

A congratulatory reviewer of Jiang Qing's Red Detachment of Women ballet wrote of Wu Qinghua's liang xiang as she leapt from the tiger's mouth of Coconut Grove that it was "fleeting but impressive, like a flash of lightning."[20] He also exclaimed: "How can this tremendous leap fail to scare world reaction out of its wits!"[21] In his "Theses on the Philosophy of History," Walter Benjamin wrote of how the past is charged with the time of the present: "Fashion has a flair for the topical, no matter where it stirs in the thickets of long ago; it is a tiger's leap into the past. This jump, however, takes place in an arena where the ruling class gives the commands. The same leap in the open air of history is the dialectical one, which is how Marx understood the revolution."[22]

一位赞颂江青版芭蕾舞剧《红色娘子军》的评论者写到吴清华从椰林寨虎口中跃出的“亮相”，称它“短暂而难忘，像一道闪电”。[20] 他还惊叹：“这惊天一跃，怎能不吓得世界反动派魂飞魄散！”[21] 瓦尔特·本雅明在《历史哲学论纲》中写到过去如何充满当下的时间：“时尚对时兴之物有敏锐嗅觉，无论它出现在多么久远的灌木丛中；它是向过去的一跃，如虎跃。然而，这一跳发生在统治阶级发号施令的竞技场。同样的跳跃若在历史的开阔天空中进行，便是辩证的跳跃，马克思就是这样理解革命的。”[22]

For many months after I learned of Li Tianpian's death, I couldn't listen to our taped conversations, let alone contemplate constraining her life with my interpretation. But her painting, once stored in a school warehouse, disappeared. Reduced from its monumental size to a fading postcard, the women it depicted stood little chance of being remembered. So I began to write in order to not forget. For the sake of the women buried in oblivion, whose bodies have been overwritten by male and national desire, I want to remember.[23]

得知李天翩去世后的好几个月里，我无法听我们的谈话录音，更不用说用我的解释去约束她的人生。但她的画作，曾存放在学校仓库，消失了。从纪念碑式的尺寸缩减为一张褪色的明信片，画中女性几乎没有被记住的可能。所以我开始写作，为了不忘记。为了那些被湮没的女性，那些身体被男性和国家欲望覆盖的女性，我要记住。[23]

Red Souvenir remains full of mytho-historical symbols frozen in time. It teems with images of unrealized potential. It will not be recognized in the current climate as a great or even a good painting, but this is exactly what infuses it with historical meaning. It is a shuang nü ti over time, a double-figured dialectic of women attempting escape who force us to question the relationship between the representation and the real.

《红色纪念品》仍然充满凝固于时间中的神话历史符号。它满是未实现潜能的形象。在当前风气中，它不会被承认为一幅伟大的画，甚至算不上一幅好画，但这恰恰赋予它历史意义。它是一幅跨越时间的双女体，一种试图逃离的女性双重形象辩证法，迫使我们质疑再现与现实的关系。

6. The term she uses for realism is xieshi (realistic depiction). The opposite of xieshi or xiesheng (drawing or painting from life) is the traditional Chinese ink painting concept of xieyi (communication of ideas and feelings), characterized by loose, suggestive, sometimes almost abstract brushwork. During the early socialist period, xieyi painting was equated with elite literati painting and therefore deemphasized. As Julia Andrews notes in Painters and Politics in the People’s Republic of China, Chinese art education first adopted European styles of painting in the Republican era: “The presumption of many idealistic intellectuals was that Western media were better suited to modern, international art, or, in the language of the May Fourth Movement, to art that was more scientific” (48). Six: Opening the Great Wall

第六章　打开长城

来源位置：206

On May 17, 2001, several busloads of art enthusiasts and journalists arrived at Jinshanling, a site on the Great Wall 140 kilometers northeast of Beijing. They proceeded to climb the wall to view an installation created by a German artist named H. A. Schult. His piece consisted of one thousand life-size figures constructed from recycled consumer waste.

2001 年 5 月 17 日，几辆大巴载着艺术爱好者和记者抵达金山岭——北京东北一百四十公里处的一段长城。他们沿城墙爬上，观看一位名叫 H. A. 舒尔特（H. A. Schult）的德国艺术家创作的装置。作品由一千个真人大小的人形组成，均用回收的消费垃圾制成。

来源位置：206

Before China, he had displayed these trash people—which he has described as "silent witnesses to a consumer age that has created an ecological imbalance worldwide"—at a re-created Roman village in Germany, the Arc de la Defence in Paris, and Moscow's Red Square.[1] As the assembled audience wandered through his installation, a woman suddenly emerged from their midst. Chinese artist He Chengyao had spontaneously stripped off her red shirt. Marching half-nude between the columns of Schult's figures, she quickly diverted media attention and cameras toward her exposed torso. He Chengyao called her action performance art and retrospectively titled it Opening the Great Wall (Kaifang changcheng) (plate 15). Photographs taken that day by reporters appeared on numerous websites. Popular and art circle reactions ensued. Was what she had done art?

来中国之前，他已在德国一座复建的罗马村庄、巴黎拉德芳斯拱门和莫斯科红场展示过这些“垃圾人”——他称之为“消费时代的沉默见证者，这个时代造成了全球生态失衡”。[1] 当聚集的观众在他的装置间漫步时，一个女人突然从人群中走出。中国艺术家何成瑶自发脱掉了红色上衣。她半裸着在舒尔特的垃圾人队列间行走，迅速把媒体注意力和镜头引向自己裸露的躯干。何成瑶称自己的行动为行为艺术，事后命名为《开放长城》（Kaifang changcheng，图版 15）。当天记者拍摄的照片出现在许多网站上。大众和艺术圈的反应随之而来。她所做的算艺术吗？

This moment proved to be a turning point in He Chengyao's career. It also served as a turning point in how I understood my role as anthropologist in the field. Through my ongoing conversations with He Chengyao, which began before Opening the Great Wall and continued after, I came to appreciate how my participation in Chinese contemporary art worlds led to the production of ethnographic knowledge that, in Fred Myers's words, "becomes inescapably part of what it represents."[2] In consideration of whether or not what He Chengyao did was art, I present several of the public responses to her performance on the Great Wall—as proliferating, conflicting interpretations of what it means for a woman to take off her clothes. The multiple discourses that it activated demonstrate the instability of a cultural object called art and what is at stake for those invested in how it represents China. I then turn to He Chengyao's story, but at a moment before Opening the Great Wall. To understand the circumstances that made this performance possible, I give an account of her personal trajectory from a town in Sichuan to the cultural capital of Beijing. This narrative includes a family history I had recorded with her several months earlier, which unbeknownst to either of us at the time would shape her interpretation of her performance on the Great Wall and lead her to create two parallel series of photographed performances.

这个时刻成为何成瑶艺术生涯的转折点，也成为我理解自己作为人类学家在田野中角色的转折点。通过我与何成瑶持续的交谈——从《开放长城》之前开始，并在此后继续——我逐渐认识到，我对中国当代艺术世界的参与如何生产出弗雷德·迈尔斯（Fred Myers）所谓“不可避免成为其所再现之物一部分”的民族志知识。[2] 在思考何成瑶的行为是否算艺术时，我呈现公众对她长城行为的若干回应——关于一个女人脱掉衣服意味着什么，这些解读不断增殖、彼此冲突。它激活的多种话语，展示了一个名为艺术的文化对象的不稳定性，以及对那些关切艺术如何再现中国的人而言，其中的利害。然后我转向何成瑶的故事，不过在《开放长城》之前的那一刻。要理解使这场行为成为可能的境况，我叙述她从四川一个小镇到文化首都北京的个人轨迹。这段叙述包括我几个月前与她一起录下的家庭史；当时我们谁也不知道，它后来会塑造她对长城行为的解释，并促使她创作两个相互并行、以摄影记录的行为艺术系列。

Interpreting He Chengyao's Opening the Great Wall

解读何成瑶的《开放长城》

来源位置：207

I was not there when He Chengyao stripped off her shirt, diverting media attention and cameras away from Schult, but within days I began to hear stories of what had happened. Chinese friends of mine with no connection to the art world had seen photos of the event on the web and questioned whether any of it was art, Schult's installation or He Chengyao's public nudity. I also found myself puzzling over the news. I had known He Chengyao for several years and thought of her primarily as an oil painter, although she had recently moved to Beijing from Chongqing to take a one-year course on contemporary art at the Central Academy of Fine Arts.

何成瑶脱掉上衣、把媒体注意力和镜头从舒尔特那里引开时，我并不在场，但几天内就开始听到发生的事。与中国艺术界没有关联的朋友在网上看到事件照片，质疑其中是否有任何东西算艺术——舒尔特的装置还是何成瑶的公开裸露。我自己也反复琢磨这条新闻。我认识何成瑶好几年，主要把她当作油画家，尽管她最近刚从重庆搬到北京，在中央美术学院上为期一年的当代艺术课程。

When He Chengyao called me a few weeks later, she was anxious and upset, on the verge of tears. She asked if I'd heard about her first attempt at performance art. She had come under attack by critics, including art commentators and fellow artists, who disparaged her action as immoral and profiteering. During a later conversation at her apartment, she asked me if I believed in spirit possession. What did I know, as an anthropologist, about this phenomenon? After being repeatedly questioned about her motivation that day, it seemed to her the most plausible explanation for what she had done.

几周后何成瑶打电话给我，她焦虑不安，几近流泪。她问我有没有听说她第一次尝试行为艺术。她受到批评者的攻击，包括艺术评论人和同行艺术家，他们贬斥她的行为不道德、为牟利。后来在她公寓的一次谈话中，她问我是否相信神灵附体。作为人类学家，我对这一现象了解什么？在反复被追问当天动机之后，这似乎成了她对自己行为最可信的解释。

Some of the critics who lambasted her performance expressed their opinions anonymously through website postings, but in her hometown of Chongqing, her husband's art academy colleagues criticized him for letting her leave home to pursue an art career in Beijing. While certainly a response to her public exposure, their criticism was not necessarily directed at the question of female nude as art. Nude paintings were first publicly shown in the prc in 1979, and Yin Guangzhong's Great Wall (figure 6.01) was shown that spring on Democracy Wall, where artists openly criticized the Cultural Revolution. Over two decades before He Chengyao, he conjoined the nude and this national symbol, in the depiction of a couple, the female nude facing forward, atop a pile of skulls. The Great Wall binds together the figures, who strain against its control.[3] Nudity in oil painting (meaning by and large female nudity), although once considered a bourgeois form of expression, underwent a period of normalization in China during the 1980s and 1990s, and a growing market for this work provided an alternative to state patronage.[4] The criticism of He Chengyao's performance as immoral singled her out in a telling way. Several male performance artists in China have incorporated partial or full nudity in their work, but none had been attacked along these lines. Some of their performances also took place on the Great Wall. In 1998, for example, artist Ma Liuming enacted one of his performances of gender ambiguity—in which he makes up his face and long hair to accentuate a performative femininity but strips naked to reveal his male genitalia—by walking a ruined section of the Great Wall as another border transgressed. What seemed to be at issue was a woman exposing her own body for the public eye and calling it art.

一些猛烈抨击她行为的批评者通过网站发帖匿名发表意见，但在她家乡重庆，丈夫所在美术学院的同事批评他让妻子离家去北京追求艺术事业。这当然是对她公开暴露的回应，但他们的批评未必针对女性裸体作为艺术的问题。裸体画 1979 年首次在中华人民共和国公开展出，尹光中的《长城》（图 6.01）那年春天在民主墙展出，艺术家们在那里公开批评文化大革命。比何成瑶早二十多年，他就把裸体与这一国家象征结合在一起，描绘一对男女，女性裸体面朝前方，两人位于一堆头骨之上。长城把人物捆绑在一起，而他们竭力反抗其控制。[3] 油画中的裸体（大体指女性裸体）虽曾被视为资产阶级表达形式，却在 1980 和 1990 年代的中国经历了一段正常化时期，这一作品市场不断扩大，为国家赞助提供了替代选择。[4] 把何成瑶的行为批评为不道德，以一种揭示问题的方式把她单独挑出。中国几位男性行为艺术家曾在作品中部分或完全裸体，却无人遭到这类攻击。他们的一些行为也发生在长城上。例如 1998 年，艺术家马六明在长城一段废墟上实施他关于性别含混的行为之一——他化妆、留长发以突出表演性女性气质，却脱光衣服露出男性生殖器——把长城当作另一条被逾越的边界。问题似乎在于，一个女人为了公众目光暴露自己的身体，并称之为艺术。

Photographs of the performance and debate over its worthiness as art appeared in places beyond the usual art media sources. A website devoted to health issues, for example, published an article later picked up by several other websites; it compared He Chengyao's performance to recent commercial spectacles in which scantily clad or naked women served as the main attraction. In an event described by the article's author, four female models posed outside a telecommunications store, revealing their bare backs onto which the new design of a cell phone had been painted. The author states: “Currently, ‘disrobing’ slides toward a commercial objective. To disrobe in the name of art seems an easy way to attract the interest of the media, as easy as stir frying vegetables at high heat, but it only takes a little art experience and critical ability to realize that taking off one’s clothes in the name of art is really quite a clumsy and inferior effort.”[5] He Chengyao’s performance was not art, in this editorialist’s assessment, because of its similarity to new gendered forms of commercialization in which the woman’s body literally becomes the medium for commodity image.

行为照片和关于它是否算艺术的辩论，出现在通常艺术媒体之外的场所。例如，一个关注健康问题的网站发表了一篇文章，后来被其他几个网站转载；文章把何成瑶的行为比作近期商业景观中半裸或裸体女性充当主要卖点的现象。在文章作者描述的一个活动中，四名女模特站在一家电信商店门外，露出赤裸的背部，上面画着新款手机的设计。作者写道：“ 如今，‘ 脱 ’ 滑向商业目的。以艺术之名脱衣，似乎是吸引媒体兴趣的捷径，像大火炒菜一样容易，但只要有一点艺术经验和批评能力就能意识到，以艺术之名脱衣服其实相当笨拙低劣。”[5] 在这位评论者看来，何成瑶的行为不是艺术，因为它类似于新出现的性别化商业化形式，其中女人的身体字面上成为商品形象的媒介。

An altered photograph of the performance appeared in the August 2001 issue of Vision 21, a Chinese magazine, new that year, devoted to fashion, culture, and photography. The editors explained to He Chengyao that they had pixilated her chest so as not to violate a recent Ministry of Culture public memorandum prohibiting performances broadcasting pornography, superstition, or violence. Their choice to obscure her nudity strategically presented the photograph as news rather than art that might offend. A short text accompanied the image:

> On May 17, 2001, at 3:00 PM, as German artist H. A. Schult displayed the one thousand trash people he had constructed from consumer waste and then transported to Jinshanling on the Great Wall, a brash woman flashed from the crowd of observers—Chinese artist He Chengyao. In a sudden movement, she pulled off her bright red shirt, grasped it in her hand, and like Delacroix’s Liberty Leading the People escorted the audience (including H. A. Schult) through the troops of trash people and leapt from the wall onto a beacon tower. In the words of discerning people, Goddess He had very intelligently raised an exposed yet restrained double-edged sword over the stage put up by Schult’s four million marks, and stole his thunder.[6]

This critic likened her performance to Liberty Leading the People, in which a bare-chested woman with gun and French tricolor in hand leads armed citizens over piles of lifeless bodies, and thereby serves as an allegorical representation of revolution: a comparison that highlights the central role of woman in symbolically standing for the nation. Delacroix's piece has often been noted as one of the first political works of modern painting. Sino-Soviet exchanges that led to the development of socialist realism as an international style adapted French academic painting to new political ends. Liberty Leading the People became a pedagogical standard, which academy-trained artists in China knew well. Chen Yifei and Wei Jingshan drew on its composition for their well-known national history painting, The Taking of the Presidential Palace, commissioned for the Military Museum in Beijing. The opening image of the 1961 Shanghai film production of The Red Detachment of Women also mirrors Delacroix's composition and subject matter. In its woodcut print of female soldiers on the battlefield, a woman with her arm raised in the air emerges on the horizon, from behind the triangular shape of a red flag that cuts diagonally across her body. As explored in the previous chapter, the film's heroine Wu Qionghua comes to represent the nation. Although He Chengyao did not include her likeness in her work, as Li Tianpain did, Wu Qionghua would become an important referent in her interpretation of her Great Wall performance.

这位批评者把她的行为比作《自由引导人民》：画中一个袒胸女人手持枪和法国三色旗，带领武装公民越过成堆尸体，从而成为革命的寓言式再现。这一比较凸显女人在象征民族时的中心角色。德拉克洛瓦的作品常被视为现代绘画最早的政治作品之一。促成社会主义现实主义发展为国际风格的中苏交流，把法国学院绘画改造成新的政治工具。《自由引导人民》成为教学范本，中国学院训练出来的艺术家都很熟悉。陈逸飞和魏景山为他们著名的国家历史画《占领总统府》借用了它的构图，该画受北京军事博物馆委托创作。1961 年上海电影制片厂《红色娘子军》的开场画面也呼应德拉克洛瓦的构图和题材。在女兵战场的木刻版画中，一名女子高举手臂，从一面斜切过她身体的红旗三角形后面出现在天际。如上一章所论，电影女主角吴琼花成为民族的代表。尽管何成瑶没有像李天翩那样把吴琼花的形象纳入作品，吴琼花后来却成为她解释自己长城行为的重要参照。

> At first glance, He Chengyao, now called "Goddess," can't be doing anything else but plotting to borrow the ready-made stage erected by the German H. A. Schult's huge monetary expenditure, all in order to find her own place in the limelight. Although the author does use the word "intelligent" to describe her, it seems a bit sour in tone since the whole article leads readers to believe that by stealing Schult's thunder, He Chengyao opportunistically aimed to gain artistic fame. However, don't forget that the exhibition of H. A. Schult's artwork, for which he laid out the large sum of four million marks, employed the five-thousand-year-old Chinese symbol of the Great Wall. That if nothing else is profiteering. Not only is Schult the bigger opportunist, he was also first, but this is just a tangent to the topic at hand. Postmodern art is a competition of wits, and as such He Chengyao quite by chance aptly seized this opportunity.[7]

乍一看，现在被称为“女神”的何成瑶，除了想借德国人 H. A. 舒尔特花巨资搭好的现成舞台，为自己在聚光灯下找一席之地，还能做什么？虽然作者确实用了“聪明”一词来形容她，但语气似乎有点酸，因为整篇文章都在引导读者相信，何成瑶抢舒尔特风头，是机会主义地为了获取艺术名声。然而，别忘了，H. A. 舒尔特为展示作品花费四百万马克巨资，动用了有五千年历史的中国象征长城。这无论如何都是牟利。舒尔特不仅是更大的机会主义者，而且是先做的，但这只是题外话。后现代艺术是机智的竞赛，因此何成瑶纯属偶然地恰当抓住了这个机会。[7]

Four years later, in October 2005, He Chengyao and five other Chinese performance artists appeared in a program titled China Live at London's Victoria and Albert Museum. The art reviewer who covered the performance series for The Guardian began her article with the following statement: "The great irony of these live performances by contemporary Chinese artists is that it gives British audiences the opportunity to see a wide range of work that has little or no legitimacy in its homeland."[8] The greater irony perhaps is the persistence of a narrow view of artistic expression as something only truly appreciated in the West. He Chengyao and other Chinese artists who succeed in attracting the attention of foreign art professionals make good on China's national goal of "entering the world." By performing in the Victoria and Albert Museum, He Chengyao's work became validated as art, but in a way that covers up the domestic debate and contention, as well as the history of cultural encounter—from Delacroix to Schult in China—it lays bare.

四年后，2005 年 10 月，何成瑶和另外五位中国行为艺术家参加了伦敦维多利亚与阿尔伯特博物馆题为“中国现场”的项目。为《卫报》报道这一系列行为的艺术评论者，以如下陈述开篇：“这些中国当代艺术家现场表演的巨大讽刺在于，它让英国观众有机会看到在其祖国几乎没有或完全没有合法性的广泛作品。”[8] 更大的讽刺或许是，人们坚持一种狭隘的艺术表达观，认为它只有在西方才真正被欣赏。何成瑶和其他成功吸引外国艺术专业人士注意的中国艺术家，实现了中国“进入世界”的国家目标。通过在维多利亚与阿尔伯特博物馆表演，何成瑶的作品获得艺术认可，但这种认可掩盖了国内争论和冲突，也掩盖了它揭示的文化相遇史——从德拉克洛瓦到舒尔特在中国。

He Chengyao and I first met at the CourtYard Gallery in the summer of 1999, roughly three years before her Opening the Great Wall performance. This gallery represented a recent confluence of transnational money and culture in Beijing, where an artist from Sichuan and an anthropologist from the United States were both new arrivals. Neither of us knew that our chance encounter would eventually lead to an intermittent but prolonged conversation about gender and contemporary art, during which He Chengyao would move to Beijing and remake herself as a performance artist and I would adopt various roles in relation to her practice: interviewer, translator, videographer, and curator.[9]

1999 年夏天，我与何成瑶在四合苑画廊第一次见面，大约是她《开放长城》行为的三年前。这家画廊代表跨国资金与文化在北京的新汇流，一个来自四川的艺术家和一个来自美国的人类学家都是新来者。我们谁也不知道，这次偶遇最终会促成长达数年的断续交谈，关于性别与当代艺术；其间何成瑶会搬到北京，把自己重塑为行为艺术家，而我会在她的实践中承担多种角色：采访者、翻译、摄像师和策展人。[9]

I was attending the opening party for the solo show of a female painter who had recently signed with the CourtYard Gallery. Handel Lee, a Chinese American lawyer based in Beijing founded the gallery in 1996 as a sideline interest to his legal work. In various interviews in the Western and Chinese press, Lee explained that he wanted to support Chinese contemporary art in Beijing, where opportunities to exhibit "avant-garde" work remained limited.[10] He also wanted to cultivate a cosmopolitan appreciation of culture in the heart of China's capital, a nexus of taste that could compete with the places he enjoyed frequenting in New York.

我当时参加一位刚与四合苑签约的女画家的个展开幕酒会。常驻北京的美籍华人律师李景汉（Handel Lee）1996 年创办这家画廊，作为其法律工作之外的副业。在西方和中国媒体的各种采访中，李景汉解释说，他想在北京支持中国当代艺术，因为那里展出 " 先锋 " 作品的机会仍然有限。[10] 他也想在中国首都的心脏培育世界主义文化品味，建立一个足以与他喜欢光顾的纽约场所竞争的文化品味中心。

Handel Lee's staff gutted and renovated the interior of an old stone courtyard building to accommodate the CourtYard restaurant and gallery, located on the moat surrounding the Forbidden City, directly across from the East Gate of the Imperial Palace. The house once belonged to a lieutenant of Yuan Shikai, commander of the North China Army who ruled from Beijing after the fall of the Qing Dynasty in 1911. During the Communist era, the building housed a factory before being partitioned into multiple family dwellings. With new property laws instituted during economic reform, the lieutenant's descendants reclaimed the building. They sold it to Lee who himself, completing this story of restoration, claimed to be descended from Manchu members of the Qing court.

李景汉的团队拆除了紫禁城护城河畔一座旧石砌四合院的内部并重新装修，用来容纳四合苑餐厅和画廊；四合院正对故宫东门。这座房子曾属于袁世凯的一位副官；袁世凯是北洋军统帅，1911 年清朝覆灭后在北京统治。共产党时代，这座建筑曾是一家工厂，后来被分隔成多户家庭住所。随着经济改革时期新财产法的实施，副官的后代收回了这座建筑。他们把它卖给李景汉，而李景汉本人也自称是清廷满族成员后裔，完成了这个修复故事。

The ground floor of the CourtYard housed a restaurant serving Asian-European fusion cuisine, mainly patronized by an expatriate and tourist clientele. A curved staircase in the entryway led downstairs to a white-cube gallery. A small crowd had gathered for the event, and conversations took place in Chinese, English, and French. Someone offered me a ride to the postexhibit party, and as I joined the departing crowd, a former schoolmate of the exhibiting painter walked up beside me, took my arm, and introduced herself. He Chengyao bubbled with questions about my research. She herself had recently arrived in Beijing from Chongqing. She planned to stay for a few weeks to exhibit her paintings at the China Art Exposition, opening in the following week. She was an oil painter, a graduate from the Sichuan Academy of Fine Arts, but Beijing with its stylish new galleries beckoned.

四合苑一层是一家供应亚欧融合菜的餐厅，主要顾客是外籍人士和游客。入口处的弧形楼梯通向地下白色立方体画廊。一小群人聚集在活动中，谈话用中文、英文和法文进行。有人提出送我去展后派对；当我加入离开的人群时，参展画家的一位旧同学走到我身边，挽住我的手臂，自我介绍。何成瑶对我的研究连珠炮般提问。她本人最近刚从重庆到北京，计划待几周，在下周开幕的中国艺术博览会上展出画作。她是油画家，毕业于四川美术学院，但拥有时髦新画廊的北京在向她招手。

I ran into He Chengyao several days later as I roamed through rows of numbered booths on the second floor of the massive International Exhibition Center, where the annual China Art Expo had been held since 1995. She and another former classmate split the reasonable expense of renting a small booth. Their works hung on opposite partition walls. Her classmate's realist oil paintings depicted quaint views of Chongqing's narrow, hilly alleys. He Chengyao's paintings featured expressionist nude figures floating in a symbolic landscape of burnt ochre hills, solitary flowers, and land depressions shaped like watchful eyes. She later sent me a postcard of one of these paintings, High Noon—Prayer (figure 6.02), and then we lost touch.

几天后，我在巨大的国际展览中心二楼一排排编号展位间闲逛时又遇到何成瑶。中国艺术博览会自 1995 年起每年在那里举办。她和另一位旧同学分摊租用一个小展位的合理费用。他们的作品挂在相对的隔墙上。她同学的写实油画描绘重庆狭窄、多坡小巷的古朴景色。何成瑶的画作则描绘表现主义裸体人物，漂浮在烧赭色山丘、孤零零的花朵和形似窥视眼睛的洼地构成的象征风景中。她后来寄给我其中一幅《正午——祈祷》的明信片（图 6.02），之后我们失去联系。

Over a year later, in the fall of 2000, I reconnected with her through a small Chinese-run gallery in Beijing exhibiting her work. The manager passed on a note from me. When He Chengyao called, we arranged to meet at an artists' "salon" held in a new commercial development that combined business offices, stores, a hotel, and upscale apartments. The evening's program included a screening of animated art films collected by two Chinese artists who had lived in New York for several years. Later we strolled toward the bright, steamy windows of a nearby hotpot restaurant. As we stirred vegetables and slices of mutton in the boiling pot of broth between us, she told me how she had come to Beijing this time. Through the connections of a friend, she managed to enter the jinxiu ban halfway through. This particular two-year "refresher" course served as an experimental introduction to contemporary art (dangdai yishu) theory and practice. This was the first time the Central Academy had offered such a course, and the instructor who initiated it remained under scrutiny as officials determined whether it would become a regular offering.

一年多后，2000 年秋天，我通过北京一家由中国人经营、展出她作品的小画廊重新联系上她。经理转交了我的便条。何成瑶打来电话，我们约定在一个艺术家“沙龙”上见面；沙龙位于一个新商业开发区，集合了办公楼、商店、酒店和高档公寓。当晚活动包括放映两位在纽约生活数年的中国艺术家收集的动画艺术片。之后我们漫步走向附近一家火锅店明亮、蒸汽弥漫的橱窗。我们在中间沸腾的汤锅里搅动蔬菜和羊肉片时，她告诉我这次是怎么来北京的。通过朋友的关系，她在中途进入进修班。这个为期两年的“进修”课程，是对当代艺术（dangdai yishu）理论与实践的实验性介绍。这是中央美术学院第一次开设此类课程，发起课程的教师仍受审查，官员们在确定它是否会成为常规课程。

He Chengyao turned serious as she explained that this opportunity allowed her to escape from a life in Chongqing that felt increasingly oppressive. In later tellings of her departure narrative, she heightened the urgent drama of taking leave by describing how she'd gotten stuck in traffic on the way to the Chongqing station. She managed to jump on the Beijing-bound train only seconds before it pulled away. Her husband and nine-year-old son waved from the platform as the train gathered speed.

何成瑶严肃起来，解释说这个机会让她逃离了越来越压抑的重庆生活。在后来的离家叙述中，她强化了告别的紧迫戏剧性，描述自己去重庆火车站路上如何堵车，在火车开动前几秒跳上开往北京的列车。丈夫和九岁儿子在站台上挥手，火车加速。

In the mid-1980s, a decade and a half before this departure, she had married a painter she met at the Sichuan Academy of Fine Arts. In her early twenties, she gave birth to their son. Now that he was older and more independent, she felt she had to grasp the chance to emerge from the professional rut of the previous decade. In Beijing, she lived cheaply in an apartment near the Central Academy, housed temporarily in a defunct factory work unit in the northeast of Beijing while the new campus was being constructed. She felt judged by several of her classmates, many of whom were male or younger women, who viewed her move away from her family as a sign of unfaithfulness, even promiscuity. But her coursework introduced theories she felt injected new energy into her thinking about art. She now saw her previous paintings as trivial and unrelated to her life. She explained that she continued to paint only to make money. Selling works such as the one I'd recently seen in the gallery helped augment her meager finances. She told me that she had begun working on her first piece of dangdai yishu.

I saw the piece several months later at an exhibit featuring works by members of her class. Hair (figure 6.03) consisted of three long plaits of human hair, each dyed a different primary color—glossy and almost iridescent yellow, red, and blue. A thin piece of glass sandwiched the thick black roots against a glass mount. Above this suspended synecdoche of changing style—a combination of old-fashioned braids and trendy new hair color—a silver plaque read:

He Chengyao created this “found object” after observing the number of people in Beijing with hair dyed in shades of brown and blond, as well as brighter colors. She conducted research in salons around the city, taking photos and talking to customers. She noted that while many sought these hairstyles as a globalized fashion statement, they had to continually maintain this mark of distinction, since their black roots always reappeared. With this piece she began to explore the body as a conjunction of art and artifact—the body as a means of expression, a form of attire, which can symbolize different identifications, of urbanity, cosmopolitanism, or even ethnic Chineseness. He Chengyao purchased the braids for Hair from rural migrant women she approached on the street in Beijing and Chongqing. The resulting work of art embodies this transaction, in which hair exchanged for money ended up hanging on a museum wall, as well as a projective historicity that tries to assess the current era from the perspective of the distant future.[12] He Chengyao’s shift from oil painting to dangdai yishu involved consciously playing with conventions of representation and museum display, blurring the representational real of ethnographic artifact with the presumed artfulness of the art object.

何成瑶在观察到北京许多人把头发染成棕色、金色以及更鲜艳的颜色之后，创作了这件“现成品”。她在全城美发沙龙调研，拍照并与顾客交谈。她注意到，许多人把这种发型当作全球时尚宣言，

却必须不断维护这一区分标记，因为黑色发根总会重新长出。通过这件作品，她开始探索身体作为艺术与人工制品的结合——身体作为表达手段、一种装束，可以象征不同认同：城市性、世界主义，甚至民族意义上的中国性。何成瑶为《头发》购买的发辫，来自她在重庆和北京街头接触的农村外来女性。由此产生的作品体现了这一交易：头发换成钱，最终挂在博物馆墙上；同时体现一种投射性历史性，试图从遥远未来的视角评估当前时代。[12] 何成瑶从油画转向当代艺术，涉及有意识地玩弄再现和博物馆展示惯例，模糊民族志人工制品再现性的真实与艺术对象被假定的艺术性。

After the exhibit, He Chengyao and I went to dinner with a Beijing curator we both knew. He pushed He Chengyao to explain the motivation behind Hair. She cryptically stated her disenchantment with the romanticism of her paintings, describing them as a commercial product that someone would hang in their living room for a few years before throwing them away. The curator's line of questioning, which came close to accusing her of mimicking Western artists who have used hair as an artistic medium, eventually turned into a mini-tirade against Chinese teaching methods for contemporary art.[13] He disparaged the practice of looking at slides of work by Western artists, arguing that it taught Chinese artists to copy, and claimed that the only Western artists worth teaching were Andy Warhol and Joseph Beuys. They had focused on the philosophical question of what it meant to be an artist engaged with society rather than on strict notions of content or form.

展览之后，何成瑶和我与一位我们都认识的北京策展人吃晚饭。他追问何成瑶解释《头发》的动机。她神秘地说自己已对绘画的浪漫主义不再着迷，把它们描述为商业产品，有人会在客厅挂几年，然后扔掉。策展人的追问近乎指责她模仿使用头发作为艺术媒介的西方艺术家，最终演变成一场对中国当代艺术教学方法的简短抨击。[13] 他贬斥看西方艺术家作品幻灯片的做法，认为这教中国艺术家抄袭，并声称唯一值得教的西方艺术家是安迪·沃霍尔和约瑟夫·博伊斯。他们关注的是艺术家参与社会意味着什么的哲学问题，而非严格的内容或形式观念。

I think sometimes I'm not really willing to talk about my private life because it's so different from that of other people. I don't mean I just want to be like others, but the past gives me a lot of pain. Why? Well, now, I see this problem relatively clearly. I think every person has a different experience growing up, and that this experience can give a lot of impetus to one's so-called future, and is very related to one's worldview. So, I think, really, to understand an artist's life experience provides a lot of inspiration for understanding the artwork. But now, I don't look back... or speak about my experience of growing up.

After growing up, I thought there must be some underlying roots from my childhood that influenced me to feel this way. Why? When I was born, my mother and father... He was just one year away from graduating, but in his third year at university, there was a nationwide famine.[17] He had a strong, solid physique, and he just couldn’t get enough to eat at school. He couldn’t stay any longer because all he felt from morning to night was hunger. He left school and went to a factory to work in art design. It was a ceramics factory. He painted flowers with glaze on ceramics.

No, he just liked it. It was a hobby he did in his spare time. He studied a little of everything. Then, after the pregnancy with me, they both lost their jobs at the factory. At that time, the whole country was very poor. The material state of life was extremely low. My father did spare jobs. He went here and there to make a little money. I don't remember things very clearly. But I know my mother was very pretty. By the time I could remember anything, my mother had gone crazy. My little brother and I were very scared.

" 她得的是什么精神病？ "

He Chengyao simply stated, "Her mind became disorganized." She slowly continued, "I think it had to do with the pressure on her. After giving birth to me, she wasn't married and was still quite young. She was affected by all the judgmental comments made about her."

何成瑶只简短地说：" 她脑子乱了。" 她慢慢继续，" 我觉得和她承受的压力有关。生我之后，她没结婚，还很年轻。周围人对她的评判影响了她。"

In a later version of this story that He Chengyao eventually wrote, she narrated with greater economy how her mother's mental illness took the form of paranoid, antisocial behavior. She hit people and pulled their hair, stripped off her clothes and wandered the town's streets.

在后来何成瑶写下的这个故事的版本中，她更简洁地叙述母亲的病如何表现为偏执、反社会的行为。她打人、扯人头发，脱光衣服在镇上街道游荡。

In my initial interview with her, she described the memories as they came to her, "In my recollections, I often see her as so frightening. She would hit my waipo and grab her hair. My waipo was a very traditional Chinese woman. After she became a married woman, she arranged her hair in a bun at the back of her head. My mom would grab her hair and pull it to the front. My memories are pretty scattered, but I remember being afraid. Every night my mom would run away. I don't know where she went. She just wanted to run. She didn't want to stay at home.

在最初的采访中，她随记忆所至描述道：" 在我的记忆中，我常觉得她那么可怕。她会打外婆、抓她头发。外婆是非常传统的中国女性。她成为已婚妇人后，把头发盘在脑后。母亲会抓住她的头发往前拽。我的记忆很零散，但我记得害怕。每天晚上母亲都会跑出去。我不知道她去哪里。她只想跑，不想待在家里。

He Chengyao's waipo, who held a combination of Buddhist and folk beliefs, would often invite fortunetellers to diagnose her mother's illness. Her grandmother thought she had fallen ill through some offense to a dead person's ghost. Even though they were really poor and seldom ate meat at the time, her grandmother would prepare a whole table full of food—fish, chicken, vegetables—to feed the visiting seer who would burn paper money to satisfy the ghosts or sprinkle water and rice in her mother's room to ward off evil. When I asked if these methods had any effect, she laughed. "Of course they were useless! But they relieved my waipo's heart a little. She thought that certainly my mother would get a little better. She really believed that she had gotten better. But in reality she hadn't."

何成瑶的外婆兼有佛教和民间信仰，常请算命先生诊断母亲的病。外婆认为她得罪了某个死人的鬼魂才生病。尽管当时家里很穷、很少吃肉，外婆仍会准备满满一桌食物——鱼、鸡、蔬菜——招待来访的灵媒；灵媒会烧纸钱满足鬼魂，或在她母亲房间里撒水撒米驱邪。我问这些方法有没有效果，她笑了：“当然没用！但让外婆心里安慰了一点。她以为母亲肯定会好一点。她真的相信她好了。但其实没有。”

"There was one time," she began, but then stopped to draw a diagram on a scrap of paper. She added to the sketch as she described the layout of their tianjing (sky well) house with rooms organized around a small open courtyard to one side. Several people slept in each room. A river and farm fields lay nearby. She went on to describe a night when she was really small. Her grandmother and a fortuneteller had left her alone when they went inside to burn money to the kitchen god. A table with a full meal laid out on it stood in the tianjing.

It was dark, after eight o'clock. At that time there were no electrical lights. Oil lamps were lit. Aiyo, at night, everywhere was completely black. Wind blew through the tianjing. It blew the flames of the oil lamps back and forth. I was scared out of my wits. I always felt like there were ghosts, some thing following right behind me. It's so frightening when you are little and listen to them say there are ghosts here and there.... I started to feel them everywhere, in front, in back, to the left and right, everywhere moving around me. The flames of the oil lamps flickered vaguely back and forth. I didn't want to stay there. I thought of running to the kitchen where they had all gone. But I stood scared stiff by the tianjing. They told me to stand guard there while they were in the kitchen to make sure no cats ate the food on the table. Back then even cats were starving and couldn't get their fill. [She laughs.] They were afraid cats would eat the food because after the food had been offered to the spirits, people could eat it.

天黑了，八点以后。那时没有电灯。点着油灯。哎呀，晚上到处一片漆黑。风吹过天井，把油灯火苗吹得摇来摇去。我吓得魂飞魄散。总觉得有鬼，有什么东西紧跟在我身后。小时候听他们说这里那里有鬼，太可怕了……我开始觉得它们无处不在，前面、后面、左边、右边，到处在我周围移动。油灯火苗隐约晃动。我不想待在那里。我想跑到他们都在的厨房。但我站在天井边吓得动弹不得。他们让我站在那里守着，他们去厨房，防止猫吃掉桌上的食物。那时连猫都饿得吃不饱。[她笑。] 他们怕猫吃食物，因为食物祭过鬼魂之后，人还可以吃。

I thought they were green-faced and long-toothed with very long hair. I thought that when they walked, their footsteps made no sound and they could float through the air. Have you read Tales of Liaozhai?[19] It was that kind of haunted feeling. At night I would sit together with the adults. If I sat behind them, I would fear there was something behind me. I would continually turn around to check, but there was never anything there. The oil lamps threw up huge shadows....

My waipo also liked to have fortunetellers read our fates—for my mother, me, my little brother, and my little sister. I remember one time we went next door to our neighbor's house. They used charts to consult when you were born, things like that, and to make predictions. I didn't understand what they were saying. I remember being woken up by my waipo from confused and hazy sleep. She'd call out, "He Li, we're going home." Then, after hearing them talk about this ghost and that ghost, I'd have to follow her down that dark passageway, with only the dim light of the oil lamp to light the way. The whole way I kept turning around to try to catch a glimpse of what was following behind me.

Back then there were some People's Liberation Army [PLA] soldiers. This was at the time in foreign relations when China was relatively isolated. They had already broken relations with the Soviet Union. It was the 1960s. So the PLA comrades, [she smiled as she remembered the rhetoric] we should say they had "united with the residents."[20] There were a lot of PLA soldiers in our town. There was a military factory with a lot of soldiers. At that time the party was advocating for them to "learn from Lei Feng."[21] I think the "learn from Lei Feng" campaign began in 1964. Anyway, some PLA soldiers came to our house. There was one who could do acupuncture, using metal needles. I think my waipo was already worn out and at wit's end. In this frame of mind, she let them give my mom acupuncture.

当时有一些人民解放军战士。那是中国外交上相对孤立的时期。他们已经和苏联断了关系。那是 1960 年代。所以解放军同志，[她笑着回忆那套修辞] 我们应当说他们‘和居民打成一片’。[20] 我们镇上有很多解放军战士。有一家军工厂，很多士兵。当时党号召他们‘学雷锋’。[21] 我想‘学雷锋’运动始于 1964 年。总之，一些解放军战士来到我们家。有一个人会用金属针做针灸。我想外婆已经筋疲力尽、无计可施。在这种心情下，她让他们给我妈扎针。

No, of course not. I don't think so. They didn't really understand this kind of illness. They wanted to try everything, every kind of folk prescription. Later they even made her eat earthworms. They prepared earthworms and white sugar together and gave it to her to eat. When I think of it now, it's so disgusting. Really they didn't have any scientific basis for what they did. They made a table, a long table, and put it here when they gave my mom acupuncture.

They came to our house every Sunday to "learn from Lei Feng." They "learned from Lei Feng" by doing "good deeds." When they came, my waipo prepared lots of things for them to eat. We were hungry, but she still gave them a lot to eat because they were helping us. Several PLA soldiers would press my mother onto a board, a long board. My mother wasn't willing, so they had to restrain her. Several men would hold her down and stick needles in her. I don't know if they put the needles into her correct acupuncture points. Why did my mother's muscles shake so? Maybe they got the points wrong. They weren't experts in this. That one PLA soldier, I can still remember him. He was from Nanjing and was called Jin Something. My waipo used to call him Little Jin.

No.... Before I came to Beijing, before I came to study at the Central Academy of Fine Arts, I really wanted to move my mom to Chongqing so that I could take care of her. I wanted her to change environments. She was still in that county town, in Rongchang County. My mom is alone. Afterward my dad got married again. He divorced my mom and married someone else. My mom lives on her own. So because of this I feel full of regret. I feel like I haven’t done anything for my mother. Now that I’ve come to Beijing, I feel like I can do some things that I like, some creative activities. But if the price is to sacrifice my mother... I think my mother... because after she dies, after she’s gone... I think it’s really like my birth brought my mother her disaster. I feel like she gave her life for my everything.

One time I said to my younger sister, “Aiya, Mama was too fragile. If only she could have been just a little stronger when we were young, we wouldn’t have received so many shocks.” Even after I grew up, I always felt inferior. I’m still not very sociable.... My sister said to me, “Mama was so young. She just didn’t have the ability to accept that sort of cruel reality. She didn’t have that kind of psychological quality.”

I believe now that my mom’s body grew disorganized due to her experience. She used her own method to resist the pressure of the outside world. She escaped into her own world. This was her way. Now I can gradually reach this understanding.

She went once for medical treatment. She was treated several times. One time it seemed like she was better, but then after one or two months, she got sick again. After she’d been sick and then gotten better, she was still extremely sensitive. For example, if the two of us were talking in this room and she was in the next room, she’d think we were talking about her even if the content of our conversation had nothing to do with her. During the period when she was well, I thought our home was so happy. My mother was very skilled with her hands and could do traditional embroidery. She worked in a little shop, sewing and helping out. She earned some money. Then she fell ill again. She turned back again.

Then one time my mother died. It was still in this house.

没有……我来北京之前，来中央美术学院学习之前，真的很想把我妈接到重庆，好照顾她。我想让她换个环境。她还在那个县城，荣昌县。我妈一个人。后来我爸再婚了。他和我妈离婚，娶了别人。我妈独自生活。所以因为这个，我满心遗憾。我觉得自己没为母亲做什么。现在我来到北京，觉得自己可以做些喜欢的事，一些创作活动。但如果代价是牺牲我母亲……我想我母亲……因为她死后，她走了以后……我想，真的好像我的出生给母亲带来了灾难。我觉得她为我的一切付出了生命。

有一次我对妹妹说：‘唉，妈妈太脆弱了。如果在我们小时候，她能坚强一点，我们就不会受那么多惊吓。’即使长大以后，我也一直自卑。我还是不太善于交际……妹妹对我说：‘妈妈那么年轻。她就是没有能力接受那种残酷现实。她没有那种心理素质。’

我现在相信，我母亲的身体因为她的经历而混乱。她用自己的方法抵抗外部世界的压力。她逃进自己的世界。这是她的方式。现在我能逐渐理解这一点。

她曾去接受治疗，治了好几次。有一次似乎好了，但一两个月后，又病了。病好之后，她还是极其敏感。比如，我们两个在这个房间说话，她在隔壁，就会以为我们在说她，即使我们谈的内容与她无关。她好的那段时间，我觉得我们家好幸福。母亲手很巧，会传统刺绣。她在一家小店工作，缝缝补补帮忙，挣些钱。然后她又病了。她又变回去了。

后来有一次，我母亲死了。还是在这座房子里。

I don’t know what caused it, but they said she had died. I was still small. They placed her on a board, on a wooden door. They took the door down and laid her dead body out on it. I was very small, just a few years old, but I still remember. I saw my mom lying there with her face covered with coarse yellow paper, the sort of paper made by hand. My dad sat by her side. I saw a teardrop hanging on the tip of my father’s nose. He cried silently. My dad was still very young then, just in his twenties. I didn’t understand this death or its meaning for my life. I didn’t understand what was happening. I only thought it was strange to see my father crying.... My dad said he would go get a doctor to bring my mom back to life. My waipo told him not to go. She said my mom had tormented us. She asked him, “Haven’t we suffered enough?”

I thought my waipo was so cruel back then, but now I can see the tragedy of her life. How did she endure it all? Still she remained optimistic. I think she influenced some part of my personality. When facing something heavy, a serious situation, she could use a relatively light tone to talk about it. She was very strong.

My dad still wanted to fetch a doctor. He found a doctor, who gave my mom a shot. They called it something like a cardiac stimulant shot. I don’t know what medicine it was. And then she came back to life. If my dad hadn’t gone to find a doctor for my mom, then maybe that time they would have just buried her.

我不知道是什么原因，但他们说她死了。我还小。他们把她放上一块板，一扇木门。他们把门卸下来，把她的遗体摊在上面。我很小，才几岁，但我还记得。我看见妈妈躺在那里，脸上盖着粗糙的黄纸，手工做的那种纸。爸爸坐在她旁边。我看见一滴泪挂在他鼻尖。他无声地哭。爸爸那时还很年轻，才二十多岁。我不懂死亡，也不懂它对我人生的意义。我不明白发生了什么。我只觉得看到爸爸哭很奇怪……爸爸说他会去请医生，把妈妈救活。外婆不让他去。她说妈妈折磨了我们。她问他：‘我们受的苦还不够吗？’

当时我觉得外婆好残忍，但现在我能看到她人生的悲剧。她怎么忍受这一切？她仍然保持乐观。我想她影响了我性格的一部分。面对沉重的事情、严峻的局面，她能用比较轻的语气谈论。她非常坚强。

爸爸还是想去找医生。他找到一位医生，给妈妈打了一针。他们称为强心针之类。我不知道是什么药。然后她活过来了。如果爸爸没有去给妈妈找医生，也许那一次他们就把她埋了。

She told me that she once attended kindergarten for a few days. She laughed when she told me that she liked it because at the end of the day they gave every child a piece of candy, a treat she never had at home. A couple of years later, her family sent her and her younger brother to live with her father's parents in a town called Lianghe. Her paternal grandfather (yeye) worked as a teacher in the middle school and thought it would be better for the children to move away from their mother and go to school. While she remembers nothing but affection and kindness from her yeye, her paternal grandmother (nainai) made it clear that she didn't like them. Their father was her eldest son, and she felt their mother had unfairly burdened him and driven him to hard labor in order to take care of her and their three children. Her father moved from job to job in order to make enough money. After first losing his job at the ceramics factory, he had served as an elementary school teacher, but the pay was too low, so he went to work for a moving company. Then he shoveled coal at the train yard. He pulled carts like a coolie. He broke rocks.

几年后，家里把她和弟弟送到父亲父母所在的两河镇一起生活。祖父（爷爷）在中学当老师，认为孩子离开母亲去上学更好。她对爷爷的记忆只有慈爱，但祖母（奶奶）明确表示不喜欢他们。他们的父亲是她的长子，她觉得他们母亲不公平地拖累了他，逼他辛苦劳作来照顾她和三个孩子。父亲为挣够钱不断换工作。在陶瓷厂的职位最初丢失后，他当过小学教师，但工资太低，于是去搬家公司工作。后来在火车站铲煤。他像苦力一样拉车，砸石头。

Then, for a while, her father managed to set himself up as a photographer. He Chengyao credits some of her early interest in drawing and painting to his vocation at this time as an itinerant image-maker. She described to me how he would take his camera to neighboring counties and towns and peddle his services as photographer. Eventually he rented a small shop in Rongchang and worked to develop contacts with local schools and work units. He took black and white group photos. She laughed, remembering that her dad took all of her class and graduation pictures. He took pride in this work, which finally enabled him to see himself as something of an intellectual and establish a connection back to his grandfather, who had once been a county secretary with beautiful calligraphy in the "old society." Her father's work became more regular, and he hung out a sign for his studio. In the late 1970s or early 1980s, a craze for the traditional folk craft of paper cutting swept across the country, and her father also began to create intricate paper cuts and sold them out of his photo studio.[22]

后来有一段时间，父亲设法成为摄影师。何成瑶把自己早年对绘画的兴趣部分归功于他当时作为流动图像制作者的行当。她向我描述他如何带着相机到邻近县镇兜售摄影服务。最终他在荣昌租下一间小店，努力与当地学校和工作单位建立联系。他拍黑白集体照。她笑着回忆，爸爸拍了她所有班级照和毕业照。他为这份工作自豪，这终于让他把自己看作某种知识分子，并与曾祖父建立联系——曾祖父在“旧社会”当过县秘书，书法漂亮。父亲的工作更有规律后，他为自己的照相馆挂了招牌。1970 年代末或 1980 年代初，传统民间剪纸风潮席卷全国，父亲也开始创作精细剪纸，在照相馆出售。[22]

After middle school, He Chengyao attended a vocational school for three years, and studied diligently to become a teacher. Teachers warned her that given her family's situation, if she didn't work hard, she wouldn't be able to get a job. Upon graduation, she taught fifth and sixth grade math at the elementary school attached to the vocational school. She also began drawing more seriously and studied with one of her father's friends who worked in the local Cultural Center. Several years later she tested into the art education department at the Sichuan Academy of Fine Arts in Chongqing.

中学毕业后，何成瑶读了三年职业学校，努力学习，想成为教师。老师警告她，以她家的状况，如果不努力，就找不到工作。毕业后，她在职业学校附属小学教五、六年级数学。她也开始更认真地画画，跟随父亲一位在当地文化馆工作的朋友学习。几年后，她考进重庆四川美术学院美术教育系。

He Chengyao gradually connected her performance on the Great Wall with this story about her childhood and her mother's experience. After the performance, she told me that she no longer wanted to be anonymous. She asked me to use her real name. When I was visiting her one fall afternoon in 2001, she showed me with a slight, shy smile her addition to a glossy volume on Western feminist art I'd given her as a gift some weeks earlier. In the back section of the book that listed biographies of individual artists, she had glued in her picture and handwritten under it her name and biographical details. She later interpreted Opening the Great Wall as the starting point of a career as a feminist artist, comparing her performance with another woman who publicly exposed her wounds, Wu Qionghua in The Red Detachment of Women. In 2003, He Chengyao sent me the following message:

> I am still in the early experimental stages of using feminism as a method for making my own art.... It's like the scene in the film The Red Detachment of Women when Wu Qionghua, having suffered the extremes of oppression and shame, takes the stage and denounces the vicious landlord Nan Batian. All she can do is tear open her clothing and show everyone her wounds. Perhaps the hatred has been too strong, the "blood and tears" too many, leaving me instead with no way to speak. It's also like a mute person who has suddenly been cured, yet she is still accustomed to using the gestures of sign language.[23]

He Chengyao revivifies, through her performance art, a revolutionary episode of female self-exposure, but freezes it and reperforms it at the moment before political training of how to properly speak her bitterness in service of socialist revolution.[24] She does not speak. She performs an action. She does not sublimate the gesture of ripping open one's clothes to a clear and victorious national cause. Nor does she shove it aside as part of a laughably naïve propagandistic vocabulary. Possessed by the spirit of her mother, denounced as immoral and driven mad, she strips off her clothes and wanders through the crowds gathered on the Great Wall. She channels the shock power of her mother's disturbed, antisocial behavior into a personal politics of gender, trauma, and speechless history that attempts to articulate art together with everyday injustice.

何成瑶通过行为艺术复活了一个女性自我暴露的革命片段，却把它冻结，并在政治训练她如何正确诉说苦难、服务于社会主义革命之前的那一刻重新表演。[24] 她不说话。她完成一个动作。她没有把撕开衣服的姿态升华为明确而胜利的国家事业，也没有把它当作可笑幼稚的宣传语汇抛到一

边。她被母亲的魂灵附体——那被斥为不道德、被逼疯的母亲——脱掉衣服，在长城上聚集的人群中游荡。她把母亲失常、反社会行为的震撼力量，转化为一种关于性别、创伤和无言历史的个人政治，试图把艺术与日常不公一起表达出来。

Testimony

The two parallel sets of performances He Chengyao went on to create demonstrate a horizontal, formal dialogue with global contemporary art practice, at the same time that they dig into different layers of history. She embraced the transnational form of performance art, as it was introduced in her course at the Central Academy, and used it to excavate both personal experience and various sociopolitical uses of the exposed female body throughout twentieth-century China. During the summer after Opening the Great Wall, He Chengyao returned to Rongchang to visit her mother. Her husband and father, both bearing cameras, accompanied her. Her husband took the photographs for a series she titled Mama and Me (figure 6.04).

何成瑶随后创作的两个平行行为系列，既展示与全球当代艺术实践在形式上的横向对话，也深入不同历史层面。她拥抱中央美院课程介绍的跨国行为艺术形式，用它挖掘个人经历，以及二十世纪中国对暴露女性身体的各种社会政治利用。在《开放长城》之后的夏天，何成瑶回到荣昌看望母亲。丈夫和父亲都带着相机陪她。丈夫为她拍摄了题为《妈妈和我》的系列照片（图 6.04）。

In a later article about her evolving work as a performance artist, she writes: “This summer I returned home. In Mama and Me, my mother sits by herself on a stool at the side of a courtyard, playing with a rotten apple, when I quietly approach and stand behind her to document this moment through a series of photographs. This is the first time my mother and I had our picture taken together. With the aid of this medium, I have been able to reaffirm the family and blood connection that links me and my mother, and to partially satisfy a yearning of more than thirty years to support, touch, and embrace her.”[25] Through photographic reproduction she gains distance on herself, standing together with her mother for an unconventional family portrait. Her mother wears only a pair of white pants. In the first image, she sits alone, looking down. In the third image, as He Chengyao takes off her shirt, her mother first seems aware of the audience of cameras. In the fifth image, He Chengyao’s mother looks up, her eyes meeting those of her daughter, whose head still remains beyond the viewer’s sight. In the final image, the daughter’s head enters the frame, and both women look down, returning doubled to the first.

在后来的文章中，她谈到自己不断演变的行为艺术创作：“ 这个夏天我回家了。在《妈妈和我》中，母亲独自坐在院子边的凳子上，摆弄一个烂苹果，我悄悄走近，站在她身后，用一系列照片记录这个时刻。这是我第一次和母亲一起拍照。借助这种媒介，我得以重新确认连接我和母亲的家族与血脉关系，并部分满足三十多年来想搀扶、触摸、拥抱她的渴望。”[25] 通过照片复制，她与自己拉开距离，和母亲站在一起，拍下一张非传统的家庭肖像。母亲只穿一条白裤子。第一张照片中，她独自坐着，低着头。第三张中，何成瑶脱下上衣时，母亲似乎第一次意识到镜头观众。第五张中，何成瑶的母亲抬起头，目光与女儿相遇，而女儿的头仍在观者视野之外。最后一张中，女儿的头进入画面，两个女人都低下头，双重地回到第一张。

For a related piece, He Chengyao selected the image from Mama and Me in which her mother looks up at her, in surprise or recognition. She combined it with photographs of herself and her son. Testimony (figure 6.05) provides a genealogical chart of matrilineal kinship, suggesting connection through bodily touch, but ending with her son alone, the space behind him empty. It stares back at the oppressions of patriarchal norms, suggesting alternative, affective webs of meaning and attachment, even as they are traumatically warped by societal pressures to comply with and replicate those norms. Does Testimony evoke a legacy of recognition and care outside the decorous bounds of convention; of mental disorder, escape, and abandonment; or of order resumed through the production a single male heir with his background erased? Familial relations and the gender politics of the nation and its art intertwine as the bodies of mother and daughter, the female figures who have served such symbolic purposes, are photographed by the unseen father and husband. In He Chengyao's unfolding work, her own body became the primary medium through which she investigated this legacy of control and its embodied and psychological dimensions. Her work thus joins a constellation of experiments by feminist performance artists like Yoko Ono and Marina Abramović, who have offered their bodies to the spontaneous treatment, often shockingly violent, of their audiences.[26] By staging the subjection of the female body, she unhinges it from the moral, emotional, symbolic work it has performed for the family and the nation. She thereby attempts to move beyond their modes of regulation.

在相关作品中，何成瑶从《妈妈和我》中选取母亲抬头看她、带着惊讶或辨认神情的那张照片，与自己和儿子的照片组合。《证词》（图 6.05）提供了一条母系亲属谱系，暗示身体接触的连接，却以儿子独自一人结尾，他身后的空间空着。它回望父权规范的压迫，暗示另类的、情感性的意义与依恋网络，即使这些网络因要求人们服从并复制那些规范的社会压力而遭受创伤性的扭曲。《证词》唤起的是习俗体面边界之外的承认与关怀遗产，还是精神失常、逃离和遗弃的遗产，抑或是通过生产单一男性继承人并抹除其背景而恢复秩序的遗产？家庭关系与国家及其艺术的性别政治交织在一起，母亲和女儿——曾服务于此类象征目的的女性形象——的身体，被不可见的父亲和丈夫拍摄。在何成瑶不断展开的作品中，她自己的身体成为主要媒介，用来考察这种控制遗产及其具身与心理维度。她的作品由此加入小野洋子和玛丽娜·阿布拉莫维奇等女性主义行为艺术家的实验群，她们把自己的身体交给观众自发的、往往令人震惊的暴力处置。[26] 通过展演女性身体的臣服，她把它从为家庭和国家承担道德、情感、象征工作中松脱。她由此试图超越其规训模式。

Signing the Great Wall

签署长城

来源位置：226, 227

In the November 2001 graduation exhibition of work by students from her course in contemporary art at the Central Academy, He Chengyao included a recombination of images from her work of the previous spring and summer. The triptych, Great Wall–Magnolia–Mama and Me (figure 6.06), tied her spontaneous performance on the Great Wall to the previously invisible and unspoken history she documented in the series of photographs taken together with her mother. Bridging the gap is a photograph showing the top of a magnolia tree, whose delicate white buds open against a blue sky. This middle image has been rotated so that the tree branches reach across to link a narrative of personal recovery to an "excessive" public performance that elicited multiple interpretations in its aftermath. By drawing this connection, He Chengyao wrests the symbols of the Great Wall and the nude female figure away from their conventional signifying power. She also implicates herself in the recent history of the Great Wall as a transnational site for avant-garde art, ever since Andy Warhol first "opened" it in the early 1980s.

在 2001 年 11 月中央美院当代艺术课程毕业展上，何成瑶把此前春夏两季作品的图像重新组合。三联画《长城——玉兰——妈妈和我》（图 6.06）把她自发的长城行为，与她跟母亲一起拍摄的系列照片中所记录的先前不可见、不可言说的历史联系起来。桥接两者的是一张玉兰树顶的照片，娇嫩的白花蕾在蓝天下绽放。中间这张图像被旋转，树枝伸向两侧，把个人康复叙事与一场引发多重解读的“过度”公开行为连接起来。通过画出这种联系，何成瑶把长城和裸体女性形象的符号从传统意指力量中夺走。她也把自己写入长城作为跨国先锋艺术场所的近期历史——自从安迪·沃霍尔在 1980 年代初首次“打开”它以来。

Several Chinese artists told me that Andy Warhol had completed a characteristically playful and perceptive art performance on the Great Wall. After climbing the wall, he pulled out a piece of paper and drew a giant dollar sign: a sign for a sign. When I tried to confirm this account, I found it was almost true. In a documentary about his 1982 trip to China, Warhol draws the giant dollar sign and then signs it during a visit to a Chinese painter's studio, exchanging it for the traditional ink painting presented to him.[27] During shots of the Warhol entourage on their way to the Great Wall, the narrator's voice announces, "Andy pointed out the Wall was the only man-made object visible from the moon with the naked eye, with the exception of the Los Angeles, California aqueduct." On the Great Wall, Warhol answers a question about whether he thought people in China could relate to his art by mumbling, "Well, I gotta get into sign painting." These comments, including the repetition of the apocryphal statement about what man-made structures can be seen from the moon, from the mouth of the pop master of replicable icons (capitalism's Marilyn Monroe and communism's Mao Zedong), point to the Great Wall as cultural sign par excellence.

几位中国艺术家告诉我，安迪·沃霍尔在长城上完成了一场典型顽皮而敏锐的艺术行为。爬上长城后，他拿出一张纸，画了一个巨大的美元符号：以一个符号交换另一个符号。当我试图核实这一说法时，发现它几乎是真的。在一部关于他 1982 年中国之行的纪录片中，沃霍尔造访一位中国画家的画室时画下巨大美元符号并签上名，用它交换对方赠送的传统水墨画。[27] 在沃霍尔随行人员前往长城的镜头中，旁白宣布：“安迪指出，长城是除加州洛杉矶输水渠之外，月球上肉眼唯一可见的人造物。”在长城上，有人问他是否认为中国人能理解他的艺术，他咕哝道：“嗯，我得去搞

招牌画了。”这些评论——包括重复那个关于从月球可见什么人造结构的杜撰说法——出自这位可复制偶像（资本主义的玛丽莲·梦露和共产主义的毛泽东）的波普大师之口，指向作为典型文化符号的长城。

Long after the Great Wall became militarily defunct, political leaders from Sun Yatsen to Deng Xiaoping revived it as a national symbol of China's might and longevity as a civilization.[28] In 1988, the 21st Century Group of experimental artists challenged this official symbolism with a performance on the wall that probed it as a site of wounded-ness. They wrapped their bodies and a section of the wall in white bandages.[29] Two later large-scale art projects on the Great Wall explored a similar theme of memorializing wasted human life. In 1990, Xu Bing organized a crew of students and peasants to help him make ink rubbings from a thirty-meter-long section of the wall for Ghosts Pounding the Wall. Zheng Lianjie's performance Binding the Lost Souls in 1993 involved gathering ten thousand broken stone bricks from fields at the foot of the wall. Participants carried them to the top, where they wrapped each one with a strip of red cloth. By the 1990s, the Great Wall became an ideal site for experimental art, especially performance art, because of its relative remove from the city. The unpredictability of performance art made it highly suspect in the eyes of state censors who often shut down exhibits that included performance of any type. When in 2000 three Chinese organizers initiated the First Open Art Platform Performance Art Festival, performances by Chinese, Japanese, and Finnish artists took place at the Juyong Gate of the Great Wall. The wall had become a veritable institution of Chinese avant-garde art.[30]

长城在军事上失效很久后，从孙中山到邓小平的政治领袖把它复兴为中国文明力量与长寿的民族象征。[28] 1988 年，21 世纪实验艺术家小组在长城上实施行为，挑战这一官方象征，把它探询为一个创伤场所。他们用白绷带包裹身体和一段城墙。[29] 后来两个长城大型艺术项目探索了类似的纪念被浪费人类生命的主题。1990 年，徐冰组织一群学生和农民，协助他从一段三十米长的城墙拓印，创作《鬼打墙》。1993 年，郑连杰的行为《绑缚失落的灵魂》收集了城墙脚下田地里的一万块碎石砖。参与者把它们搬到墙顶，用红布条逐一包裹。到 1990 年代，长城成为实验艺术、尤其是行为艺术的理想场所，因为它相对远离城市。行为艺术的不可预测性使国家审查者高度怀疑它，他们常关闭任何包含行为艺术的展览。2000 年，三位中国组织者发起第一届开放艺术平台行为艺术节，中国、日本和芬兰艺术家的行为在长城居庸关举行。长城已经成为名副其实的中国先锋艺术机构。[30]

With her half-nude body, He Chengyao took over the Great Wall as sign and made it her personal stage, stealing it and the media apparatus away from H. A. Schult, as well as Chinese male performance artists who throughout the 1980s and 1990s used the wall for works of political dissent and macho liumang testing of human limits.[31] Opening the Great Wall represents an intersection of multiple image worlds: those of woman as national allegory, from Delacroix's Liberty Leading the People to Mukhina's Woman and Collective Farm Worker to the 1989 Goddess of Democracy amalgam; of Chinese artists and the Great Wall; of foreign artists and the Great Wall; and of feminist performance art. He Chengyao's mimesis of a Chinese avant-garde already integrated into the political economy of the commodity-sign flaunts a nude torso as superfluous spectacle that garners media attention and angry commentary on how she has cheapened herself and art: "that's not art." Yet the mimetic performance of her mother's transgressive behavior refers to the experience of suffering, the traumatic realism of being made into an expressionless sign, silenced of subjectivity.

情符号、被剥夺主体性的创伤性现实主义。

Playing Chess with the Historical Avant-Garde

与历史先锋派下棋

来源位置：230

During 2001, as He Chengyao began exploring this personal history, she also embarked on a parallel set of photographed performance pieces. These experiments in embodied performance and photographic documentation enacted a chess game of sorts with two father figures of the Western historical avant-garde, Marcel Duchamp and Joseph Beuys. Through these exercises, she performs a mimesis of pivotal moments in their development of forms that sought to overthrow institutionalized notions of autonomous art. By literally inserting her body into the now canonical art history of the avant-garde, she acts on it in a mode of investigating the limitations of their critique, drawing particular attention to the Other occluded by universalized narratives of radical rupture.

2001 年，何成瑶在开始探索这段个人历史的同时，也启动了一组平行的摄影行为作品。这些具身行为与摄影记录的实验，与西方历史先锋派的两位父亲人物——马塞尔·杜尚和约瑟夫·博伊斯——进行某种棋局。通过这些练习，她模仿他们发展那些试图推翻制度化自主艺术观念的形式的关键时刻。通过把自己的身体字面插入如今已成经典的先锋艺术史，她以一种考察其批判局限性的方式作用于它，特别关注被普遍化的激进断裂叙事遮蔽的他者。

Just after she had made a break from painting, He Chengyao turned to the work of Marcel Duchamp, specifically the transitional moment in 1912 when he began to depart from painting. With its single-frame reference to serial photography, Nude Descending a Staircase, No. 2 blurs the difference between painting and mechanical reproduction. It outraged early audiences denied the enjoyment of consuming what Duchamp referred to as "retinal art" created to please the eye.[32] In With Respect to Marcel Duchamp (figure 6.07), He Chengyao returns to this seminal moment in modern art and through continued serialization takes the game one step further. She performs the nude, becoming the body stripped for spectacular viewing, and with the aid of a long photographic exposure disappears into a blur. She staged this exercise in one of Beijing's new private galleries, the China Art Archives and Warehouse, a joint project of European and Chinese artistic directors, the most famous being Ai Weiwei. This site, like others partially managed by foreign intermediaries, played an important role in integrating Chinese contemporary art with the international art market and in cultivating the idea of art as a liberating reversal of socialist art in service to the state. As these institutions took hold in China, He Chengyao returned to Duchamp's deconstruction of gendered spectacularity. She engaged with the historical avant-garde not in a cynical or derivative way but in a way similar to a chess move that restructures the game's meaning, its history, and anticipated future. She cites across time and space, not as attribution or homage, but to shift understandings of the world-making power of images.

刚脱离绘画时，何成瑶转向马塞尔·杜尚的作品，特别是 1912 年他开始离开绘画的过渡时刻。《下楼梯的裸体，第 2 号》以单帧参照连续摄影，模糊了绘画与机械复制之间的差异。它激怒了早期观众，使他们无法享受消费杜尚所谓为取悦眼睛而创作的“视网膜艺术”。[32] 在《向马塞尔·杜尚致敬》（图 6.07）中，何成瑶回到现代艺术的这一开创时刻，通过继续系列化把游戏推进一步。她表演裸体，成为为奇观观看而剥光的身体，并借助长曝光消失在模糊中。她在北京一家新私人画廊——中国艺术文件仓库——实施这一练习；该机构由欧洲和中国艺术总监共同主持，最著名的是艾未未。这个场所以及其他部分由外国中介管理的场所，在把中国当代艺术整合进国际艺术市场、

培育艺术作为对服务于国家的社会主义艺术的解放性颠倒这一观念方面，发挥了重要作用。随着这些机构在中国立足，何成瑶回到杜尚对性别化奇观的解构。她与历史先锋派的接触不是犬儒或派生的，而类似一步重新构造游戏意义、历史和预期未来的棋。她跨时空引用，不是为了注明出处或致敬，而是为了转移对图像创造世界力量的理解。

In 1963, five years before Marcel Duchamp's death, the Pasadena Art Museum held a retrospective of his work. Los Angeles photographer Julian Wasser arranged for a photo shoot of the artist at the museum and came up with the idea of photographing Duchamp playing chess with a nude woman, an art student who agreed to participate.[33] Duchamp cooperated and played several games with the student at a table set up in front of his work titled The Bride Stripped Bare by Her Bachelors, Even. While critics have argued for a nuanced deconstruction of gender relationality in Duchamp's work, these notorious photographs by Wasser demonstrate the function of the authorial Duchamp as "Dada's Daddy," trumping at chess his bride stripped bare.[34] He Chengyao's With Marcel Duchamp as My Opponent (figure 6.08) returns not just to the art of Duchamp, but to the media spectacle of Duchamp. She sits half-nude at a table in her apartment playing against an absent opponent. By reference to a historical photograph, she invokes a clothed, male, Western presence who does not yet recognize her, and she challenges him not only to his beloved game of chess but also to the Chinese game of go.

1963 年，马塞尔・杜尚去世五年前，帕萨迪纳艺术博物馆举办了他的回顾展。洛杉矶摄影师朱利安・瓦塞尔安排艺术家在博物馆拍照，想出让杜尚与一名裸体女人下棋的主意；那是一位同意参与的艺术学生。[33] 杜尚配合，在作品《被单身汉剥光的新娘，甚至》前摆设的桌旁与学生下了几盘棋。尽管批评者论证杜尚作品对性别关系有细致解构，瓦塞尔这些臭名昭著的照片显示，作为作者的杜尚功能如同“达达之父”，在棋局中击败被剥光的新娘。[34] 何成瑶的《以马塞尔・杜尚为对手》（图 6.08）不仅回到杜尚的艺术，也回到杜尚的媒体奇观。她半裸坐在公寓桌旁，与一个缺席的对手下棋。通过参照一张历史照片，她召唤一个尚不承认她的、着衣的男性西方在场者，并向他发起挑战，不仅要下他钟爱的国际象棋，也要下中国围棋。

He Chengyao then moved on to Joseph Beuys, declaring adherence to his belief that “art heals wounds,” and performed a personal reworking of one of his spontaneous “actions.” In a 1964 festival of Fluxus artists held at the Technical College Aachen in Germany, Beuys performed a piece that angered several audience members to the point that they stormed the stage. When a right-wing student punched him in the face, Beuys responded by letting blood drip from his nose, displaying his wound as he saluted the crowd with a crucifix held up in his other hand. Photographed again in her apartment for this experiment in connecting her personal life to art via the historical avant-garde, He Chengyao performs Beuys’s spontaneous ritualistic action, although she stands nude and confronts an invisible audience. In A Salute to Mama (With Respect to Joseph Beuys) (figure 6.09), her raised arm suggests less the ironic fascist gesture of Beuys’s salute and more of a grasping after the unseen, the ephemeral, spirits that haunt. She holds in her other hand not a crucifix but a framed photograph of her mother, who as a reproduction becomes a sacrificial talisman that she also physically reembodies by stripping bare. He Chengyao’s copies are mimetic in that they obsessively and bodily reproduce mass spectacularity, family history, and the historical avant-garde, in order to put the self in differential tension with a complex overlay of Others. She performs a kind of “ethnographic surrealism,” in James Clifford’s terms, that reverses the historical direction of French Dada-ists rummaging around for collage materials at the Musée de l’Homme.[35]

何成瑶随后转向约瑟夫·博伊斯，宣称信奉他“艺术疗愈伤口”的信念，并对他的一个自发“行动”进行个人重演。1964 年在德国亚琛技术学院举行的激浪派艺术家节上，博伊斯表演了一件作品，激怒了几名观众，他们冲上舞台。一名右翼学生朝他脸上打了一拳，博伊斯让鼻血滴下，展示伤口，同时用另一只手举起十字架向人群致意。何成瑶再次在自己的公寓中接受拍摄，进行这一通过历史先锋派把个人生活与艺术联系起来的实验；她表演博伊斯的自发仪式行为，但赤身裸体，面对不可见的观众。在《向妈妈致敬（致约瑟夫·博伊斯）》（图 6.09）中，她举起的手臂与其说暗示博伊斯致意中讽刺性的法西斯手势，不如说是在抓取不可见的、短暂的、萦绕的魂灵。她另一只手拿的不是十字架，而是母亲的一张装框照片；照片作为复制品成为牺牲护身符，她又通过脱光衣服在身体上重新赋形。何成瑶的复制是一种模仿：执念般、身体性地复制大众奇观、家庭历史和历史先锋派，以使自我与层层叠叠的复杂他者保持差异张力。她实施的是詹姆斯·克利福德（James Clifford）所谓一种“民族志超现实主义”，颠倒了法国达达主义者在人类博物馆翻找拼贴材料的历史方向。[35]

He Chengyao's early photographed performances led her in 2002—approximately one year after Opening the Great Wall—to stage a performance that fully embodied, rather than just testified to, the experience of her mother at the hands of the Lei Feng uncles who tried to cure her with acupuncture. For 99 Needles (plate 16), He Chengyao asked a friend trained in Chinese medicine to prepare her body for a set of performance images. She wanted her entire body pierced with ninety-nine acupuncture needles. She arrived at the clinic where her friend worked during the lunch hour so that they could complete the work without interference from doctors or patients who might question the appropriateness of this "treatment." The night before her period had begun, and her friend warned her of the contraindication against acupuncture during menstruation. He Chengyao insisted on going through with the plan. In fact, this violation seemed in keeping with the piece. Several other friends were on the scene to record the process through video and photography. After all of the needles had been inserted, somewhat hastily because of the excessive number requested and the restriction of time, He Chengyao walked outside and stood against a gray brick wall for a series of photographs. One needle had been imprecisely inserted, and she began to bleed from a spot above her right wrist. She became increasingly light-headed and finally fainted, crumpling to the ground, before the doctor rushed over to begin removing the needles.

何成瑶早期摄影行为引导她在 2002 年——大约《开放长城》一年后——实施一场完全具身化、而非仅仅见证母亲在雷锋叔叔们手中被针灸治疗的经历的行为。为《九十九根针》（图版 16），何成瑶请一位受过中医训练的朋友为她的身体作准备，以拍摄一组行为图像。她想让全身扎上九十九根针灸针。她在午休时间来到朋友工作的诊所，以便不受医生或病人干扰地完成，因为他们可能质疑这种 " 治疗 " 是否恰当。前一天晚上她月经来了，朋友警告经期针灸的禁忌。何成瑶坚持按计划进行。事实上，这种违禁似乎与作品一致。另外几位朋友在场，用录像和摄影记录过程。所有针都插入后——由于要求的数量过多、时间有限，动作有些仓促——何成瑶走到外面，背靠灰砖墙站立，拍了一系列照片。一根针插入不精确，她右腕上方开始流血。她越来越头晕，最终昏倒，瘫倒在地，医生冲过来开始拔针。

One criticism of performance art in the Mainland has focused on the narrowness of its immediate audience, usually made up of a few art circle insiders. The "performance" circulates mostly as photographic reproduction, entering domestic and international image economies in this mediated form. He Chengyao's photographs embrace this problem as at the heart of any attempt to express the expressionless, becoming sign at the same time the sign is deployed to probe the trauma of thus being robbed of expression.

对大陆行为艺术的一种批评聚焦于其直接观众狭窄，通常只有几个艺术圈内部人。" 行为 " 主要以照片复制形式流通，以这种中介形式进入国内和国际图像经济。何成瑶的照片把这一问题当作任何试图表达失去表达能力之物的尝试的核心：成为符号的同时，符号也被用来探查由此被剥夺表达的创伤。

Her performance photographs might be read as “typical” representations of the oppression, with particularly gendered dimensions, suffered under modern political movements in China. However, her resolutely transnational dialogue with masculinist avant-garde forms injects her art practice with an awareness of how women’s bodies (and lives) get caught within and between socialist and capitalist systems of sign making, reproduction, and circulation. Her images extend the critique that Lingzhen Wang has made about the limitations of the “exposure literature,” “literature of the wounded,” or “literature of reflection” that emerged after Mao’s death, creating a public space for reflection on the excesses of past political movements, especially the Cultural Revolution.[36] Wang argues that these works isolated the impact of politics on individual lives as the only realm of personal experience legitimate for public airing. Gendered forms of private oppression—stories about unhappy marriages, domestic abuse, or expressions of female sexual desire deemed inappropriate—did not fulfill the requirements for politically significant content. He Chengyao’s work registers such trauma, at the level of the body, caused by attempts to separate the impossibly intertwined personal experiences of the public and political, particularly when image economies of different eras interacted under the cultural conditions of late socialism–late liberalism that characterized new millennial China. Her performance photographs reveal how gender underpins nationalism and globalization, but also the contradictions that arise in the zone of encounter of Chinese contemporary art.

她的行为照片可以被解读为人们在中国现代政治运动中所遭受压迫的“典型”再现，其中带有特别的性别维度。然而，她与男性主义先锋形式坚决的跨国对话，为她的艺术实践注入一种意识：女性的身体（和生命）如何陷入社会主义与资本主义符号制造、复制和流通体系之内及之间。她的图像延伸了王玲珍对“暴露文学”“伤痕文学”或“反思文学”局限性的批评——这些文学在毛泽东去世后出现，创造了一个反思过去政治运动——尤其是文化大革命——中种种过激行为的公共空间。[36] 王玲珍论证，这些作品把政治对个人生活的影响孤立为唯一可合法公开的个人经验领域。性别化的私人压迫——不幸福婚姻、家庭暴力或被视为不恰当的女性性欲表达——不符合具有政治意义内容的要求。何成瑶的作品在身体层面记录了这种创伤，其成因是将公共与政治的不可分交织的个人经验强行分离，尤其当不同时代的图像经济在晚期社会主义—晚期自由主义文化条件下——这是千禧年中国新时期的特征——相互作用时。她的行为照片揭示性别如何支撑民族主义和全球化，也揭示中国当代艺术相遇地带中产生的矛盾。

For He Chengyao, however, performance as a cathartic form of release and healing remained vital. In February 2002, several months before 99 Needles, she staged another piece at the China Art Archives and Warehouse, where the previous year she had stripped off her top and descended a staircase for With Respect to Duchamp. Illusion (figure 6.10) took place outside, in an open courtyard. For the performance, she wore a billowing hand-sewn white robe that hung to her ankles. She walked barefoot across pale winter grass toward a long grey brick wall. Across from the wall stood a male friend. He held close to his chest a heart-shaped dressing-table mirror, with an iris and a flying bird etched on its surface. The mirror reflected sunlight onto the wall. The slightest manipulation of the mirror in his hands sent the spot of light skittering over the bricks. It landed first on He Chengyao's face, causing her to squint. It then moved across her body. She grabbed and patted her chest as she tried to catch it, and then caressed her side as it slid down her leg to the ground. The small sunlike spot moved erratically across the wall, and she chased after it, jumping up, crouching down, frantically slapping the bricks, speeding up and slowing down according to its movements. The white robe flew, ghostlike, behind her. Sometimes instead of pursuing the light, she tried to evade it, dodging away from or cowering beneath its capricious, perpetual motion. The recording of a Buddhist meditation chant, accompanied by drums, bells, and zither, played in the background, mixing with birdsong, clicking camera shutters, and the rumble of construction trucks and workers' shouts on the other side of the wall. He Chengyao began to audibly pant from her exertions. Almost ten minutes into the game, the light returned to its starting point, illuminating her face. She came to a standstill and bowed her head. In documentary photographs of the performance, her figure registers only as a white blur of motion in front of the towering grey wall, an ephemeral presence on the verge of disappearing, or an active force in reordering the pain and pleasure of being in the world.

然而，对何成瑶而言，行为作为宣泄性的释放和疗愈形式仍然至关重要。2002 年 2 月，即《九十九根针》几个月前，她在北京中国艺术文件仓库实施另一件作品；前一年她曾在那里脱掉上衣、走下楼梯，完成《向杜尚致敬》。《幻象》（图 6.10）在户外露天庭院进行。她穿着一件飘动的、手工缝制的白色长袍，长及脚踝。她赤脚走过苍白的冬草，走向一堵长长的灰砖墙。墙对面站着一位男性朋友。他把一面心形梳妆镜紧贴胸前，镜面刻着一朵鸢尾花和一只飞鸟。镜子把阳光反射到墙上。他手中镜子稍有移动，光斑就在砖上滑动。它先落在何成瑶脸上，使她眯起眼睛，然后移过她的身体。她抓握、拍打自己的胸口，试图捉住光，随后当光斑滑下她的腿落到地面时，她抚摸身体侧面。小小的太阳般光斑在墙上不规则移动，她追逐它，跳起、蹲下、疯狂拍打砖墙，随它的运动加速、减速。白袍像幽灵般在她身后飞扬。有时她不去追光，而是试图躲开它，闪避或蜷伏在其反复无常、永不停歇的运动下方。背景播放着伴随鼓、钟和古筝的佛教诵经录音，与鸟鸣、相机快门声，以及墙另一边建筑卡车轰鸣和工人喊声混在一起。何成瑶开始明显喘息。游戏进行近十分钟时，光回到起点，照亮她的脸。她停下来，低下头。在行为的纪实照片中，她的身影只是高耸灰墙前一道因运动而模糊的白色身影，一个濒临消失的短暂存在，或一股重新安排身处世界的痛苦与快乐的活动力量。

12. Seven years later, He Chengyao returned to the transactional question raised by Hair, of what it means to purchase part of someone else’s body. In November 2006, she created a performance work for Vital 06: International Chinese Live Art Festival held at the Chinese Arts Centre in Manchester, England. The performance, titled The Possibility of Hair, consisted of a live auction of her own hair, which she had grown out over several years for the occasion. She knelt on the floor, with her head awkwardly tipped back so her long braid could be displayed on a table behind her. A live video shot from above was projected at the front of the room as audience members called out bids. Cai Yuan, a Britain-based Chinese artist, won the auction, which concluded with him cutting He’s hair from her scalp with a pair of scissors. See Fok, Life and Death, 174–75. [返回]

16. A popular postsocialist discourse on sex characterizes "natural" contemporary sexual expression as liberation from the "unnatural" socialist silencing of sexual desire as bourgeois and therefore politically immoral. The story of He Chengyao's birth out of wedlock reveals instead a continuity across eras of sexual desire, even outside of established norms, and cautions that the question should not be whether there was more or less sex in different periods but how the specific forms, regulations, and social interpretations of it differ across eras. 18. Although He Chengyao refers several times to her family as traditional, their household does not follow conventional descriptions of traditional Chinese kinship organization, in which a model type of patrilineality, patrilocality, and patriarchy privileges the importance of male lineage and emphasizes agnatic relations, those between male kin, above others. For more on gender and kinship, see Croll, Feminism and Socialism in China; Johnson, Women, the Family, and Peasant Revolution in China; Ono, Chinese Women in a Century of Revolution; and Stacey, Patriarchy and Socialist Revolution in China. The family in He Chengyao's account fits more closely an alternative kinship form known as uxorilocal marriage, characterized by a man who marries into a family lineage with no male descendents and takes the surname of his wife. He Chengyao's father's residence with his wife and mother-in-law seems, however, based primarily on his wife's mental illness. [返回]

18. 尽管何成瑶多次称她的家庭是传统的，她的家庭住户结构并不符合对中国传统亲属组织的常规描述。在这种组织的一种典型模式中，父系继嗣、父居制与父权制赋予男性世系首要地位，并强调男性亲属之间的宗族关系高于其他关系。关于性别与亲属关系的更多讨论，见 Croll, Feminism and Socialism in China；Johnson, Women, the Family, and Peasant Revolution in China；Ono, Chinese Women in a Century of Revolution；以及 Stacey, Patriarchy and Socialist Revolution in China。何成瑶叙述中的家庭，更接近一种称为入赘婚的替代性亲属形式：男子嫁入没有男性后代的家族世系，并随妻姓。不过，何成瑶的父亲与妻子和岳母同住，似乎主要是出于妻子患有精神疾病。[返回]

20. In February 1964 the ccp launched a mass campaign for citizens to "learn from the pla" as exemplars of ideological correctness and technical proficiency, or in sloganistic parlance as "both red and expert." This political movement emerged from a conflict over the future direction of party-army relations. By the late 1950s increased stratification and professionalism within the army—a move away from the Maoist model of egalitarianism—had led to strained relations between the military and civilians, as well as between commanders and political commissars. After the failed Great Leap Forward, Mao sought to reconsolidate his control over "reactionary" moderates within the party and turned to the pla as a power base outside of the party to support his position. Under Lin Biao's leadership, the army trend toward professionalism was curtailed through a reassertion of revolutionary values and politics among the troops. For example, in 1963 Lin Biao arranged for publication of Quotations from Chairman Mao (the "little red book") and distributed it widely throughout the military. During the ensuing years of the Cultural Revolution, the pla took on a wider range of administrative and civil functions than ever before, particularly at the local level. Demobilization of troops into the pla's Production and Construction Corps to work on civilian projects reached a peak in the late 1960s and early 1970s. During this period, ccp leadership called on the pla in contradictory ways, to maintain order and to encourage revolutionary activity, so that the military served as an equilibrium force during a period of extreme politics. At times they expected the pla to give training and guidance to Red Guards, and at other times used the pla to control Red Guard radicalism when factional fighting threatened to completely disrupt social order. In 1968 the central government ordered Red Guards to surrender their weapons to the pla, and subsequently used the pla to run classes on university campuses and in industrial enterprises to "reeducate" Red Guards. 20. 1964 年 2 月，中共发起了一场群众运动，号召公民" 学习解放军"，以他们为思想正确、技术过硬的典范，或用口号化的话说，是" 又红又专"。这场政治运动源于围绕党军关系未来方向的一场冲突。到 1950 年代末，军队内部日益加剧的等级化与专业化——偏离毛泽东式的平等主义模式——已使军民关系以及指挥员与政治委员之间的关系趋于紧张。大跃进失败后，毛泽东力图重新巩固对党内" 反动" 温和派的控制，于是把解放军当作党外的权力基础来支持自己的立场。在林彪领导下，军队的专业化倾向因革命价值与政治在部队中的重申而受到遏制。例如，1963 年林彪安排出版《毛主席语录》（" 红宝书"），并在军队中广泛分发。在此后的文化大革命岁月里，解放军承担了比以往更广泛的行政与民事职能，尤其是在地方层面。部队复员进入解放军生产建设兵团、从事民用工程，在 1960 年代末和 1970 年代初达到高峰。在此期间，中共领导层以相互矛盾的方式调用解放军：既维持秩序，又鼓励革命活动，使军队在一个极端政治的时期充当平衡力量。有时他们期望解放军对红卫兵进行训练和指导，有时又用解放军控制红卫兵的激进主义，因为派系武斗有可能彻底破坏社会秩序。1968 年，中央政府命令红卫兵向解放军交出武器，随后又用解放军在大学校园和工业企业开办学习班，" 再教育" 红卫兵。见 Dreyer, China's Political System；Joffe, "The Chinese Army in the Cultural Revolution"；Ruwitch, Lei Feng and the "Learn from Lei Feng" Campaign of 1963；以及 Shichor, "Demobilization." 21. "Learn from Lei Feng" became the most famous and long-lived propaganda piece to come out of the general "learn from the pla" campaign, in which individual soldiers and entire pla units were promoted as ideological symbols for national emulation. Lei Feng was a common solider, a son of poor peasants from Hunan, whose posthumously published diary espoused self-sacrificing service to the revolution, country, comrades, and above all Mao Zedong. The Japanese had killed his father, and his mother's suicide after a rape by her landlord-employer's son left Lei Feng an orphan, placed in the care of his aunt and uncle. One year after his mother's suicide, in August 1949, the People's Liberation Army freed their village, and Lei Feng entered school. He eventually joined the pla and became a squad leader and member of the party, a common soldier who made up for his small size by sheer determination and devotion to the cause. As a servant to the people he declared, "I will be a screw that never rusts and will glitter anywhere I am placed." In 1962, he died at the age of twenty-two in a truck accident. Immediately after his death, military leaders within the Shenyang army base promoted his story, exhorting soldiers to "study Lei Feng, aspire to Lei Feng, surpass Lei Feng." By 1963, party leaders published Lei Feng's diary as a more widespread propaganda tool. The good deeds he recorded in the diary included sending his meager savings to a fellow soldiers' parents who were devastated by a flood, serving tea and food to officers and recruits, and washing his comrades' feet and darning their socks after a long march. Many suspect that it was not necessarily the soldier Lei Feng but propaganda writers who penned the famous and possibly fictitious, or at least enhanced, diary that later served to popularize his story of model behavior. See Dreyer, China's Political System, 248; Landsberger, "Lei Feng"; Ruwitch, Lei Feng and the "Learn from Lei Feng" Campaign of 1963; Spence, The Search for Modern China, 597–99; 727. [返回]

21. " 学雷锋" 成为这场普遍的" 学习解放军" 运动中最著名、最长寿的宣传作品；在这场运动中，单个士兵和整个解放军单位被推举为供全国效仿的思想符号。雷锋是一名普通士兵，湖南贫农的儿子。他身后出版的日记宣扬为革命、国家、同志，尤其是为毛泽东自我牺牲的服务。日本人杀害了他的父亲；母亲在被地主雇主的儿子强奸后自杀，使雷锋成为孤儿，由亲属抚养（原文为 aunt and uncle）。母亲自杀一年后，1949 年 8 月，人民解放军解放了他们的村庄，雷锋进入学校。他最终参加解放军，成为班长和党员；这个普通士兵以纯粹的决心和对事业的忠诚弥补了自己身材的矮小。作为人民的勤务员，他宣称：”我要做一颗永不生锈的螺丝钉，放到哪里就在哪里闪光。”1962 年，他二十二岁时死于一场卡车事故。他死后不久，沈阳军区内部的军队领导人便宣传他的故事，勉励士兵”学雷锋、赶雷锋、超雷锋”。到 1963 年，党领导人出版了雷锋日记，作为更广泛传播的宣传工具。他在日记中记录的好事包括：把微薄的积蓄寄给一位同志在水灾中遭受重创的父母；为军官和新兵端茶送饭；在长途行军后为战友洗脚、补袜子。许多人怀疑，写下那本著名、可能虚构或至少经过加工的日记的未必是士兵雷锋，而是宣传工作者；这本日记后来使他的模范行为故事广为人知。见 Dreyer, China's Political System, 248；Landsberger, ”Lei Feng”；Ruwitch, Lei Feng and the ”Learn from Lei Feng” Campaign of 1963；Spence, The Search for Modern China, 597–99; 727。[返回]

A woman in a camouflage tank top and pants stands on swampy ground with binoculars held to her eyes. The artist Lei Yan appears in this guise in the pair of photographs What If the Long March Had Been a Women's Rights Movement? (figure 4.04) and What If They Had Been Women? (figure 4.05) that she created for The Long March encounter with Judy Chicago at Lugu Lake. As a former career soldier in the People's Liberation Army (pla), she does not naively revisit the imagery of the woman soldier so central to Communist revolutionary cultural production. She reinhabits a subjectivity that shaped her life and art in order to review it from the focus afforded by the optical device—the binoculars or camera—she raises to her eyes. With this pair of photographs and the continuation of her What If series that followed, Lei Yan activates an image world of women viewing the world anew through binoculars, a complex network of images invoked in the process of looking and making.

一个身穿迷彩背心和迷彩裤的女人站在沼泽地上，双手举着望远镜贴在眼前。艺术家雷燕以这副模样出现在两幅一组的照片《如果长征是一场女权运动?》（图 4.04）和《如果他们是女人?》（图 4.05）中。这两幅照片是她为" 长征" 项目在泸沽湖与朱迪 • 芝加哥相遇而创作的。作为中国人民解放军（PLA）的一名退役职业军人，她并非天真地重访共产主义革命文化生产中如此核心的女兵形象。她重新栖居于一种塑造了她人生与艺术的主体性，以便从她举到眼前的视觉器具——望远镜或相机——所提供的焦点去审视它。通过这两幅照片以及随后延续的《如果》系列，雷燕激活了一个由举着望远镜重新观看世界的女性构成的图像世界，一个在观看与创作过程中被唤起的复杂图像网络。

A woman in a long black skirt and high-collared jacket stands at water's edge. Strokes of green ink sprout around the hem of her skirt and weave through the pattern on her jacket. The blue of the bow in her hair echoes the gradations of wash tinting water, sky, and distant mountains. Three small sailboats cleave to and accentuate the horizon line. With her back to the viewer, the woman gazes through binoculars, not at the water, boats, or mountains, but upward toward a flying machine in the top right corner. The black-and-white form suggests an airplane, but closer inspection reveals a fantastical abstraction, an assemblage of crosshatched shapes. The wings are not flush with one another. A basket or a net hangs from the undercarriage, with a sandbaglike form dangling down. This illustration (figure 7.01) appeared on the October 1916 cover of The Women's Eastern Times (Funü shibao), a journal published in Shanghai during the first six years of Republican-era China (1911–49). Its new woman on the verge of flight from earth into the heavens stands as one instance in a genealogy of women with binoculars to their eyes.[1] Twenty some years earlier, Wu Youru, a popular illustrator of urban vignettes for the pictorial supplement to Shanghai's Shenbao newspaper, had depicted three courtesans on an upper balcony "sightseeing" with a pair of binoculars.[2] Framed by the balcony balustrade, they gaze out from an interior space, over the rooftops of neighboring buildings, toward something beyond the image's edge. The woman holding the binoculars leans over, tilting her line of sight slightly downward. These elegantly attired "blossoms" of the pleasure quarter display not only their conspicuous consumption of modern technology, but also their visual mastery. They are caught, as they are looked at, in the act of looking. The world-making power of vision, outward and upward, symbolizes women's move out of the "inner quarters" of traditional Chinese society.

一个身穿黑色长裙、高领上衣的女人站在水边。绿色墨迹从裙摆周围生出，穿行于她上衣的图案之间。她发间蝴蝶结的蓝色，与晕染水面、天空和远山的深浅墨色相互呼应。三只小帆船紧贴并凸显出地平线。女人背对观者，举着望远镜，看的不是水面、船只或群山，而是右上方一架飞行器。那黑白形体像是飞机，细看却是奇异的抽象构成，由一组交叉排线的形状拼合而成。两翼并不齐平，起落架下挂着一只篮子或一张网，还有一个沙袋状的东西垂下来。这幅插图（图 7.01）刊于 1916 年 10 月《妇女时报》封面。该刊于民国（1911—1949）最初六年间在上海出版。那位即将从大地飞向天空的新女性，构成了" 举着望远镜的女人" 谱系中的一个实例。[1] 二十多年前，为上海《申报》图画副刊绘制市井小品的著名画家吴友如，曾描绘过三名妓女站在楼上阳台上，举着一副望远镜" 看风景"。[2] 她们被阳台栏杆框住，从室内空间向外望去，越过邻近建筑的屋顶，看向图像边缘之外的某物。举望远镜的女子俯身向前，视线微微下倾。这些衣饰优雅的风月场的" 花朵"，不仅展示着对现代技术的炫耀性消费，也展示着视觉上的掌控力。她们在被观看的同时，也被捕捉于观看的动作之中。向外、向上的视觉所具有的世界营造之力，象征着女性走出传统中国社会的" 内闱"。

During the New Culture movement of the early Republican period, the "woman question" preoccupied reformers in their quest to overturn China's feudal and colonial history. They saw women as central to the project of modernity, even as they debated how to liberate women and what their role in the new nation would be. Reform efforts simultaneously gave rise to a literary revolution, as authors began to use baihua, or vernacular, instead of classical Chinese, which for centuries had preserved literacy as an elite domain. Popular newspapers and magazines flooded the urban market, creating a new reading public. Women became a target audience, and while nationalists discussed the "woman question" often through their desire as humiliated male colonial subjects to emerge on the world stage, female readers and writers articulated their thoughts and stories in these new publications.[3] The illustration on the October 1916 cover of The Women's Eastern Times presents this aspiring female subject with her power of vision and dreams of flight. Two articles within narrate the heroism of Zhang Xiahun, a young woman who, on attending a Shanghai air show, insisted on flying. She ignored the head of the aviation school, who tried to dissuade her, and proclaimed her flight would "open a new era of Chinese women pilots, forge a new dawn in the history of female bravery, and merit several lines in China's aviation history."[4] When a strong wind arose and caused the plane to crash, she walked away injured but triumphant. This new woman, binoculars aimed toward the horizon, haunts the pair of photographs Lei Yan created almost a century later for The Long March. Garbed now in camouflage and black military boots, she stands her ground not on a balcony or at water's edge but on the battlefield of history.

在民国初年的新文化运动中，" 妇女问题" 成为改革者力图推翻中国封建与殖民历史的核心关切。他们将女性视为现代性工程的核心，同时也在争论如何解放妇女、妇女在新国家中应扮演何种角色。改革同时催生了一场文学革命：作者们开始使用白话而非文言，而文言几个世纪以来一直使识字成为精英的专属领域。通俗报刊与杂志大量涌入城市市场，造就了新的阅读公众。女性成为目标读者；民族主义者讨论" 妇女问题"，往往出于身为受辱的男性殖民臣民、渴望登上世界舞台的欲望，而女性读者与作者则在这些新出版物中表述自己的思想与故事。[3] 《妇女时报》1916 年 10 月号的封面插图，呈现的正是这样一位怀抱视觉之力与飞行之梦、心向高处的女性主体。同期两篇文章讲述了年轻女子 Zhang Xiahun 的英勇事迹：她参观上海一场飞行表演时，坚持要乘坐飞机。她不顾航空学校校长的劝阻，宣称自己的飞行将" 开辟中国女飞行员的新纪元，为女性勇敢史缔造新的黎明，并在中国航空史上赢得数行记载"。[4] 一阵强风刮来，飞机坠毁；她受伤脱身，却带着胜利者的姿态。这位把望远镜对准地平线的新女性，幽灵般萦绕着雷燕近一个世纪后为" 长征" 创作的那两幅照片。如今她一身迷彩、脚蹬黑色军靴，不再站在阳台或水边，而是坚守在历史的战场上。

Lei Yan's What If series inspired the conception of feminist sight lines that frames this final section of the book. I interpret her work as feminist because of its critical historiographical consciousness cultivated by being on the periphery. I met Lei Yan, as described in chapter 4, not in Beijing but in rural Yunnan, albeit through an art exhibit organized in and emanating from the "cultural capital" of Beijing. She works primarily in Kunming but trained in the pla Arts Academy in Beijing and continues to exhibit her work there. Her center-off-center position, as well as the conjunction of the turning point of her career after retirement from the military with that of Chinese contemporary art production, informs the transhistorical and transnational connections her artwork makes visible. The feminist sight lines opened by her evolving body of work provide a critical vantage on the work of art in the era of late socialism-late liberalism, as these two social projects and their management of difference and inequality intertwine. When she and Ai Weiwei both responded through their art to state image control of the 2008 Wenquan earthquake, she entered into relational monumental/ephemeral proximity with China's most globally recognized art world figure. Viewed together, the questions Lei's work raises about conventional narratives of Chinese contemporary art emerge in particular relief.

雷燕的《如果》系列启发了本书最后一部分用以统摄全局的" 女性主义视线" 概念。我之所以将她的作品解读为女性主义的，是因为它带有一种由边缘位置培养出来的批判性史学意识。如第四章所述，我与雷燕相遇不在北京，而是在云南乡间，尽管那是通过一场在北京" 文化首都" 中组织并向外辐射的艺术展览。她主要在昆明工作，却曾在北京的解放军艺术学院受训，并继续在那里展出作品。她偏离中心的中心位置，以及她退役后艺术生涯的转折点与中国当代艺术生产的转折点

相合，都塑造了她的作品所揭示的跨历史、跨国联系。她不断演化的作品所开启的女性主义视线，为审视晚期社会主义—晚期自由主义时代的艺术提供了一个批判性视点，因为这两种社会工程及其对差异与不平等的管理正相互交织。当她与艾未未都以艺术回应国家对 2008 年汶川地震图像的控制时，她与中国最受全球瞩目的艺术界人物进入了纪念碑式 / 短暂性的关系性邻近之中。将两人的作品并置来看，雷燕作品对当代中国艺术常规叙事提出的问题便格外清晰地显现出来。

Binoculars bring something distant into closer view. Side-mounted mirror-symmetrical telescopes, designed to be hand held, produce an impression of depth that makes the scene viewed three-dimensional. When Lei Yan shows up in her stereoscopelike images What If the Long March Had Been a Women's Rights Movement? and What If They Had Been Women?, she reverses the sight line of her historical counterparts from the previous turn of the century. The courtesan as public figure of urbanity and the learned new woman of the Republic gaze toward an imagined future, what once seemed impossibly distant suddenly brought near. In 2002, Lei trains her binoculars back on a Communist past meant to seem distant in reform-era discourse about linking tracks with the capitalist world. Instead, she brings it near, as historical figures from 1934 loom large on the horizon.

望远镜能把远处之物拉近。两侧镜像对称、可手持的望远镜产生景深，使所观景物显得立体。当雷燕以她那两幅立体镜式的照片《如果长征是一场女权运动?》和《如果他们是女人?》现身时，她颠倒了上一个世纪之交与她遥相呼应的那些女性的视线。作为城市性公共形象的妓女，与民国博学的新女性，都凝望着一个想象出来的未来——那曾显得遥不可及的一切，忽然被拉到了近前。2002年，雷燕把望远镜调转，回望一段在改革时代关于与世界资本主义接轨的话语中被刻意显得遥远的共产主义过去。她反而把它拉近，让 1934 年的历史人物赫然矗立在地平线上。

The feminist grammar of her "what if" titles is akin to that of the future anterior employed by Tani Barlow in her reading of Ding Ling's Maoist literary corpus. Barlow argues that the revolutionary injunction for cultural workers like Ding to "enter life" (shenru shenghuo) meant more than living with and representing the common people. It expressed a Maoist cultural idiolect that invented language for mass consciousness and action on the historical horizon, a dialectical process of "anticipate, initiate, reflect, criticize, regroup, and reanticipate."[5] As Ding entered life in this sense, her stories and novels not only reflected this process, they became part of the process, even while holding on to the speculative question about what "women" would become through their enunciation as such. The future anterior guides the historian to focus on theoretical claims from the past about the potential women were imagined to embody. Barlow uses this grammatical construction as a methodology for reassessing not only the legacy of Chinese feminism but of feminism as an international mode of thought linked to colonialism and globalization, as much a measure of one's place in the world order as a demand for liberation. The future anterior makes possible a speculative question: What will women have been? It does not presume to know what the "woman" predicated by feminism existentially is or was but endeavors to understand how the category of woman has been mobilized toward future change of an untenable status quo.[6] The artworks produced by Lei Yan through her participation in The Long March raise related questions about what women might have become if they had not been caught by the double binds of Chinese Communist history. She roams back and forth over this and more recent historical terrain, performing an auto-ethnographic excavation of the institutions and socio-historical processes that made her as both artist and woman.

她那些" 如果" 标题的女性主义语法，近似于白露（Tani Barlow）在解读丁玲毛泽东时代文学文本时所用的" 将来完成时"。白露认为，对丁玲这样的文化工作者发出的" 深入生活" 的革命号召，并

不只是与群众共同生活并表现他们。它表达的是一种毛泽东时代的文化独特语汇，为历史地平线上的群众意识与行动发明语言，是一个” 预判、倡导、反映、批评、重组、再预判” 的辩证过程。[5] 当丁玲以这种方式进入生活时，她的小说和故事不仅反映了这一过程，也成为过程的一部分，同时还保留着一个思辨性问题：” 妇女” 通过被如此言说将会变成什么。将来完成时引导历史学者关注过去的理论主张——关于女性被想象可以承载的潜能。白露用这一语法结构作为一种方法，不仅重新评估中国女性主义的遗产，也重新评估女性主义作为一种与殖民主义和全球化相连的国际思想方式；它既是衡量一个人在世界秩序中所处位置的尺度，也是对解放的要求。将来完成时使一个思辨性问题成为可能：女性将会曾经成为什么？它并不自以为知道女性主义所断定的” 女人” 在存在论上是什么或曾是什么，而是努力理解” 女人” 这一范畴如何被动员起来，以推动对一个难以维持的现状的未来改变。[6] 雷燕通过参与” 长征” 创作的作品，提出了相关问题：如果女性没有被中国共产党历史的双重束缚所捕获，她们可能会成为什么？她在这片历史地形与更晚近的历史地形之间来回漫游，对自己既成为艺术家又成为女人所凭借的建制与社会历史过程，进行了一场自我民族志式的挖掘。

Lei Yan’s trajectory as an artist began with a career in the Chinese military that spanned three decades. Born into a Kunming military family in 1957, she joined the army at age fourteen and served over the years as a soldier, nurse, and officer. As part of her early duties, she gained sketching skills and responsibility for drawing her unit’s blackboard announcements. In 1976, she began studying printmaking. She also transferred to the Kunming Military District Creative Works Team and had her work shown in China’s National Military Art Exhibition. With her next assignment to a local military hospital, she became an official painter tasked with illustrating teaching materials for the military medical school. After “reform and opening,” the school opened a multimedia lab, where she studied color photography. She also served, as a nurse, during the prolonged border conflicts of the Sino-Vietnamese War. In 1989, she tested into the first printmaking course offered by the People’s Liberation Army Arts Academy in Beijing and arrived in the capital shortly after the China/Avant-Garde exhibit at the National Art Museum of China brought new attention and notoriety to contemporary practices such as installation and performance art. After graduating in 1991, she returned to Kunming and experimented, outside her official capacity, with new styles and subject matter. She joined a group of artists working in Kunming’s Chuang Ku, or Loft community, established in a former factory, where she set up a studio after her retirement from the military in 2001.[7] After she and fellow Kunming-based artist Sun Guojuan joined Judy Chicago at site six of The Long March, they participated in cross-cultural art exchanges to Sweden facilitated by TGC Nordica, a Chinese-Swedish organization that opened a gallery space in the Kunming Loft complex in 2000. Through this gallery, Lei and Sun curated a series of exhibitions featuring the work of female artists from Yunnan.[8]

雷燕的艺术生涯始于在中国军队中度过的三十年。她 1957 年出生于昆明的一个军人家庭，十四岁入伍，此后多年先后当过士兵、护士和军官。早年职责之一，是学习素描，并负责绘制部队的黑板报。1976 年，她开始学习版画。她后来调入昆明军区创作组，作品入选全军美术作品展。下一次被分配到当地一所军医院后，她成为专职画家，负责为军医学校的教学材料绘制插图。改革开放后，学校开设多媒体实验室，她在那里学习彩色摄影。在中越战争漫长的边境冲突中，她还担任过护士。1989 年，她考取解放军艺术学院在北京开设的第一届版画课程，并在” 中国现代艺术展” 于中国美术馆举办、使装置和行为艺术等当代实践引起新的关注与争议后不久抵达首都。1991 年毕业后，她回到昆明，在官方职责之外尝试新的风格与题材。她加入了在昆明” 创库”（由一家旧工厂改建的艺术家社区）工作的艺术家群体，并于 2001 年退役后在那里设立工作室。[7] 她与同在昆明的艺术家孙国娟一起在” 长征” 第六站与朱迪 • 芝加哥会合后，又参加了由 TGC Nordica 促成的

赴瑞典跨文化艺术交流。这家中国—瑞典机构于 2000 年在昆明创库开设画廊。通过这家画廊，雷燕与孙国娟策划了一系列展览，呈现云南女性艺术家的作品。[8]

Lei Yan is not particularly well known outside of minor transnational networks linking, for example, Yunnan with Scandinavia. Nor is her path to becoming an artist via the military one typically associated with contemporary art practice, especially that in an avant-garde, anti-institutional mode, although it does bring back into the picture the longer translingual history of avant-garde/xianfeng in China. It is precisely this center-off-center position that informs her work. The pieces she began creating after her retirement exemplify a critical historiographical consciousness, a feminist reflection on past avant-gardes that temporally confounds the straight logic of innovation, progress, and coming before. She works from within a national representational corpus, subjecting it to various experiments informed by transnational art movements, to reveal the fields of violence—literal and figural—it has enacted. She is a propagandist turned deconstructionist, with a vision in which the nannü relations between man and woman inform other socially reproduced abstractions—past and present, rural and urban, China and the world—that create injustice.

雷燕在连接云南与斯堪的纳维亚等地的小型跨国网络之外并不特别知名。她经由军队成为艺术家的道路，通常也不被与当代艺术实践联系在一起——尤其是那种先锋、反建制的实践——尽管它确实把中国”先锋”（xianfeng）更长时段的跨语言历史重新带回了画面。正是这种偏离中心的中心位置，塑造了她的作品。退役后开始创作的作品体现出批判性的史学意识，一种对过往先锋派的女性主义反思，在时间上扰乱了创新、进步、先行的直线逻辑。她从一套国家表征语汇内部工作，让它经受各种受跨国艺术运动启发的实验，从而揭示它曾施行的暴力场域——字面的与比喻的。她是从宣传家转变为解构者的人，在她的视野中，男女（nannü）关系塑造着其他由社会再生产出来的抽象对立——过去与现在、乡村与城市、中国与世界——并制造不公。

Three sociohistorical categories—the woman soldier, the military artist, and the woman artist—have shaped Lei Yan's life and art. The ways they intersect throw into question conventional narratives of feminist art in global and national contexts. Her career does not, for example, fit easily into the story of feminist art emerging from 1960s Euro-American Second Wave feminist critiques of the art world and its social and formalistic hierarchies. It similarly resists Chinese articulations of nüxing yishu as a post-socialist recuperation of female subjectivity that domesticates and depoliticizes work by women and thereby cuts it off from interpretation within larger contexts of the nation and beyond. Lei Yan's artistic practice, its subject matter and formal aesthetics, requires consideration beyond the borders of the nation because of its critique of loss and sacrifice in the name of the nation. She arguably becomes a feminist artist in spite of or because of her original training as an artist in what is arguably the sine qua non of the modern Chinese nation-state, the People's Liberation Army of the Chinese Communist Party.

女兵、军旅艺术家和女性艺术家这三个社会历史范畴，塑造了雷燕的人生与艺术。它们相互交汇的方式，使全球与民族语境中女性主义艺术的常规叙事受到质疑。例如，她的职业生涯不易被纳入这样一个故事：女性主义艺术诞生于 1960 年代欧美第二波女性主义对艺术界及其社会与形式等级所进行的批判。她的职业生涯同样难以纳入中国对”女性艺术”（nüxing yishu）的表述——那种把女性艺术当作后社会主义对女性主体性的收复，驯化并去政治化女性创作，从而使女性作品无法在民族国家内部及更大语境中被解读。雷燕的艺术实践、题材与形式美学，要求超越民族国家边界来考察，因为它批判以民族之名造成的丧失与牺牲。可以说，她成为女性主义艺术家，或是突破了最初的艺术训练所设下的限制，或恰恰得益于这种训练；训练她的机构是中国共产党领导的

中国人民解放军，而这一机构可谓现代中国民族国家不可或缺的条件。

The categories of woman soldier (nübing), military artist (junyi), and woman artist (nüxing yishujia) are historical catachreses, master words whose appearance in speech mark a departure from traditional usage (i.e., woman, soldier, artist) and serve to consolidate new social formations. In The Question of Women in Chinese Feminism, Tani Barlow argues that "woman" as expressed in the Chinese neologisms of nüxing and funü emerged as a theoretical category, rather than a universal given, out of the Chinese drive to form a modern nation. These historical catachreses and their analogues of nübing, junyi, and nüxing yishujia are ideological entities with explanatory power that over time served to organize everyday thinking.

女兵（nübing）、军旅艺术家（junyi）和女性艺术家（nüxing yishujia）这些范畴是历史性的词语误用，是主导词；它们在言语中的出现标志着对传统用法（即女人、士兵、艺术家）的偏离，并有助于巩固新的社会构形。在《中国女性主义中的女性问题》中，白露认为，" 女性" 与" 妇女" 这些中文新词所表达的" 女人"，是在中国建设现代民族国家的驱动下作为理论范畴而非普遍给定物出现的。这些历史性的词语误用，以及女兵、军艺、女性艺术家等对应词，都是具有解释力的意识形态实体，在历史中逐渐组织起日常思维。

Beginning in the 1920s, the woman soldier in China signified a new subject, a woman liberated from traditional kinship protocols and empowered to fight for the idea of a new nation, free from feudal rule and its patriarchal oppressions, as well as colonial incursion and orientalist depictions of Asian women oppressed by their "culture" as justification for invasion. Xie Bingying served as one early model of this emerging subject. Born in 1906, she struggled to get an education, escaped from an arranged marriage, moved in and had a child with her lover, and served in the National Revolutionary Army in the fight against local warlords in the 1920s and the Japanese in the 1930s. The publication of her war diaries, first in 1928, followed by updated versions, made her story available for wide public consumption.[9] In breathless prose, she wrote, for example, of her first night after joining the female company of Wuhan's Central Military and Political School: "I thought how in only a few hours we would be carrying guns and sticks, marching to the cry of 'one-two-three-four.' Solider. What a powerful word! I would not have believed that we Chinese women, repressed by ancient custom for thousands of years, would see the day when we would become soldiers. Now we must work hard to carry out our responsibility, to change society, to destroy the powers of feudalism."[10] The woman soldier, glorified in films such as Daughters of China (1949), The Red Detachment of Women (1961), and The Red Lantern (1970), became a key figure in the Chinese Communist Party's pantheon of heroic representation. The woman soldier and her visibility in film, propaganda posters, and painting supported party rhetoric about female emancipation and gender equality. She also provided women with a new subject position, a potentiality some embraced, even as they continued to encounter gender hierarchy and sexual violence in the military and elsewhere.[11]

从 1920 年代开始，中国的女兵意味着一种新的主体，一个从传统亲属礼法中解放出来、被赋权为建立一个新国家的理念而战的女人，她既摆脱封建统治及其父权压迫，也对抗殖民入侵以及东方主义将亚洲女性描绘为受其" 文化" 压迫、从而为侵略辩护的做法。谢冰莹是这一新兴主体的早期典范之一。她 1906 年出生，为受教育而挣扎，逃离包办婚姻，与恋人同居并育有一个孩子，1920 年代在国民革命军中参加讨伐地方军阀的战斗，1930 年代又投身抗日。她的战地日记于 1928 年首次出版，此后又出过增订版，使她的故事得以广泛流传。[9] 她用令人屏息的文字写道，例如，加入武汉中央军事政治学校女生队后的第一夜：" 我想着，再过几个小时，我们就要扛起枪和棍棒，随

着’ 一二三四’ 的口令行进。士兵。多么有力的词！我简直无法相信，我们中国女性被古老礼俗压抑了数千年，竟能活着看到成为士兵的一天。现在我们一定要努力履行自己的责任，改变社会，摧毁封建势力。”[10] 女兵在《中华女儿》（1949）、《红色娘子军》（1961）和《红灯记》（1970）等影片中被颂扬，成为中国共产党英雄表征殿堂中的关键形象。女兵及其在电影、宣传画和绘画中的可见性，支撑着党关于妇女解放与性别平等的修辞。她也为女性提供了一个新的主体位置，一种有些人欣然拥抱的可能性，尽管她们在军队内外仍不断遭遇性别等级与性暴力。[11]

The modern conception of the military artist or art soldier dates to the Red Army’s establishment of its guerrilla base in Yan’an, where Mao Zedong compelled culture workers to become willing oxen, heads bowed to serve the people. His selective quotation from Lu Xun’s poem “Self Mockery” as final salvo in his talks on literature and art draws power from Lu’s conviction that only culture could save China from the habits of thought and behavior that had made it weak. Mao’s didactic interpretation of the quoted couplet, however, disregards ironic contrasts in the full poem, whose narrator reflects on the defiant gestures of his past and ends with a desire to retreat from the outside world to “a small house hidden away.”[12] Mao emphasized cultural defiance, reformulation, and revolutionary anticipation over contemplative ambivalence, clearing the ground for ccp institutionalization of culture workers and performance troops. The Yan’an Lu Xun Arts Academy was established in 1938, two years after the death of its namesake.[13] As part of this institutional legacy, the People’s Liberation Army Arts Academy, established in Beijing in 1960, began offering advanced training for members of military cultural troops in art, dance, drama, literature, and music. Culture as the front line continued during the Cultural Revolution in Red Guard art activities such as the 1967 Long Live the Victory of Chairman Mao’s Revolutionary Line exhibit at the National Art Museum of China.[14] Ballet, film, and opera productions like The Red Detachment of Women effectively fused together the figures of woman soldier and military artist.

军旅艺术家或艺术战士的现代观念，可追溯到红军在延安建立游击根据地时期。毛泽东迫使文化工作者做甘愿俯首为人民服务的牛。他在文艺讲话结尾选择性引用鲁迅《自嘲》中的诗句，其力量来自鲁迅的信念：只有文化才能把中国从使其积弱的思维与行为习惯中拯救出来。然而，毛泽东对所引诗句的说教式解释，无视整首诗中的反讽对照；诗中的叙述者回望自己昔日的桀骜姿态，最后却渴望从外部世界退隐到” 躲进小楼”。[12] 毛泽东强调文化上的反抗、重新表述与革命预判，而非沉思性的矛盾心理，从而为中国共产党将文化工作者和演出队伍建制化扫清道路。延安鲁迅艺术学院成立于 1938 年，即其命名对象去世两年之后。[13] 作为这一制度遗产的一部分，1960 年在北京成立的解放军艺术学院开始为军队文艺团体的成员提供美术、舞蹈、戏剧、文学和音乐方面的高级培训。文化作为前线，在文化大革命期间的红卫兵美术活动中延续，例如 1967 年在中国美术馆举办的” 毛主席革命路线胜利万岁” 展览。[14] 芭蕾、电影和歌剧作品如《红色娘子军》，有效地把女兵与军旅艺术家的形象熔合在一起。

The idea of the woman artist arose in a post-Mao context, as the Chinese art historical category of nüxing yishu gained currency in the 1990s, casting a retrospective net that pulled modernist figures into its project. It emerged in exhibit catalogues and art criticism in 1995, the year Beijing hosted the United Nations Fourth World Conference on Women, and then served as the organizing rubric for the Century Woman exhibit at the National Art Museum of China in 1998. Following the centennial frame of the exhibit's title, catalogue essays on early twentieth-century painters such as Pan Yuliang and Qiu Ti discussed them as predecessors of a "women's art" shaped by women's unique psychobiological predispositions. This discursive formation, as part of post-Mao feminist humanist thought that sought to recuperate a female subjectivity from the state mobilization of women, identifies a subject different from that signified by female artist (nü yishujia), or artist who happens to be a woman. The curator of Century Woman, Jia Fangzhou, defined in his catalogue introduction the main characteristics of this art: it draws inspiration from personal reflection and experience, demonstrates "artistic intuition," breaks from rational thought, focuses on the minutiae of daily life rather than politics, and develops both material and method from "handicrafts" associated with women.[15] Two years later, in A History of Chinese Contemporary Art, 1990–1999, one of the first comprehensive surveys of this period, Chinese art historian Lü Peng relegated almost all female artists to a chapter titled "Women's Art," rather than as contributors to movements discussed in other chapters, such as political pop, cynical realism, or conceptual art.[16]

女性艺术家的观念兴起于后毛泽东时代。中文艺术史范畴" 女性艺术" 在 1990 年代流行开来，回溯性地张开一张网，把现代主义人物也拉进其计划。它于 1995 年出现在展览图录和艺术批评中——那一年北京主办了联合国第四次世界妇女大会——随后成为 1998 年中国美术馆" 世纪 • 女性" 展览的组织标题。依照展览标题的百年框架，图录中讨论潘玉良、丘堤等 20 世纪初画家的文章，把她们视为一种" 女性艺术" 的先驱；这种艺术由女性独特的心理生物学禀赋所塑造。这一话语构形是后毛泽东时代女性主义人道主义思想的产物，它试图从国家对妇女的动员中收复女性主体性，并标示出一种不同于" 女艺术家"（nü yishujia，即碰巧是女人的艺术家）的主体。展览" 世纪 • 女性" 的策展人贾方舟在图录导言中界定了这种艺术的主要特征：它从个人反思与经验中汲取灵感，展现" 艺术直觉"，与理性思维断裂，关注日常生活的细枝末节而非政治，并从与女性相关的" 手工艺" 中发展出材料与方法。[15] 两年后，在中国艺术史学者吕澎所著的、这一时期的首批综合概览之一《中国当代艺术史：1990—1999》中，几乎所有女性艺术家都被归入题为" 女性艺术" 的一章，而不是作为政治波普、玩世现实主义或观念艺术等其他章节所讨论运动的参与者。[16]

In 2002, Lei Yan brought the three ideological categories of woman soldier, military artist, and woman artist together in What If the Long March Had Been a Women's Rights Movement? and What If They Had Been Women?, exhibited in the "women's art" section of The Long March project. While she created these images in response to Judy Chicago's fantasy "what if" projection, her visual materials reference not a universal female subject but a formative Chinese historical event, as Communist activists regrouped in order to revolutionize a rural peasantry. Their appeal to disenfranchised men, "bare sticks" without the means to marry, held out the promise of equal opportunity to carry on one's patriline rather than women's liberation from the inner quarters of family life. Red Army guerrilla activities gradually prioritized class over gender in a way that suppressed thinking about class and gender as interlocking or mutually constitutive systems of power, even as representations of women raped and exploited by class enemies served a prominent symbolic function.[17] This ideological suppression produced the double binds at Yan'an that Ding Ling exposed so trenchantly in "Thoughts on March 8": female comrades were denounced for pursuing politics over family responsibilities, but then when compelled to marry and bear children, they were denounced for being "Noras returned home," unable to survive independently and thus consigned to a destiny of "backwardness."[18] "It would be better," she wrote before being attacked as "narrowly feminist," "if there were less empty theorizing and more talk about real problems, so that theory and practice would not be divorced, and better if all Communist Party members were more responsible for their own moral conduct."[19] An investigation of this relationship between theory and practice, between ideology and image making became part of Lei's emerging praxis.

2002 年，雷燕把女兵、军旅艺术家和女性艺术家这三个意识形态范畴汇聚于《如果长征是一场女权运动?》和《如果他们是女人?》中，并在" 长征" 项目的" 女性艺术" 部分展出。尽管她是为了回应朱迪 • 芝加哥幻想式的" 如果" 投射而创作这些图像，她的视觉材料所指涉的并不是普遍的女性主体，而是一个塑造现代中国的历史事件：共产党活动分子重新集结，以便在农村发动农民革命。他们对被剥夺权利的男性——无力娶妻的" 光棍"——的号召，许诺的是延续父系血脉的平等机会，而不是把妇女从家庭生活的内闱中解放出来。红军游击活动逐渐把阶级置于性别之上，从而压抑了把阶级与性别视为相互扣连、相互构成的权力体系来思考，尽管阶级敌人强奸和剥削妇女的表征仍发挥着突出的象征功能。[17] 这种意识形态压抑在延安造成了丁玲在《三八节有感》中尖锐揭示的双重束缚：女同志因追求政治而置家庭责任于不顾遭到谴责，可当她们被迫结婚生育后，又被斥为" 回家的娜拉"，无法独立生存，从而被判定为" 落后"。[18] " 与其空谈理论，不如多谈实际问题，使理论与实践不致脱节；" 她在被攻击为" 狭隘女性主义" 之前写道，" 如果所有共产党员都能对自己的道德行为更负起责任，那就更好了。"[19] 对这种理论与实践、意识形态与图像生产之间关系的探究，成为雷燕逐渐形成的实践的一部分。

Lei Yan first developed her technique of digital manipulation as a military artist. In 1994, she and colleague Tang Zhigang produced a photograph of military heroes titled Group Photo of an Era (figure 7.02), with the handwritten inscription of "A Souvenir of the People's Photo Studio Serving the People."[20] The layers of translucent color applied to the soldiers' hands and faces accentuate the montage construction of the photograph, as it brings together, in the Maoist tradition of reworked historical images, a group of heroes in the impossible reality of a studio shot. The washed out national colors of red and yellow that shade their skin mimic old hand-colored photographs, tingeing the image with nostalgia and parody. In her 2002 What If photos, Lei reproduces this technique but also inserts herself, as part of the represented collectivity and distantiated creator-observer of its power. She becomes a frontline observer from the future within the historical photograph, who brings into focus an oppositional consciousness, posing historiographical questions about her own social formation.

雷燕首次发展出数码处理技术，是在她做军旅艺术家期间。1994 年，她与同事唐志冈制作了一张题为《一个时代的合影》的军人英雄照片（图 7.02），上面有手写题字" 为人民服务的人民照相馆留念"。[20] 敷在士兵手和脸上的半透明色层，突出了照片的蒙太奇构造：它延续毛泽东时代改写历史图像的传统，把一群英雄聚合进照相馆合影这一不可能的现实之中。晕染他们皮肤的红黄两种国家象征色因褪色而显得暗淡，模仿着手工上色的老照片，为图像染上怀旧与戏仿的色调。在 2002 年的《如果》照片中，雷燕复制了这种技术，同时也把自己插入其中：她既是被再现的集体的一部分，又是对其力量保持距离的创作者—观察者。她成为历史照片中来自未来的前线观察者，把一个对抗性的意识带入焦点，并对自身的社会构形提出史学问题。

She continued the series with several more pieces. What If Our Factory Were Still Here? (figure 7.03) emerged from video and photographic documentation of a factory within her military work unit as it underwent demolition. Like other artists who focused on the massing turning over of China's urban landscape, Lei used her camera to explore sites of physical change. Her images bring to this presentist form of documentation questions of temporality, history, and memory. She inserts herself again within the frame, but this time the figure seems more a camouflaged observer from the past in panoramic projects of future destruction. Her image of the factory, an institutional space that once organized and defined social life, is imbued with a sense of loss: through the question she asks of it, her use of the possessive pronoun "our," and her digitally manipulated spectral appearance within it. She stands in miniature with her binoculars, amid the rubble, witness to the dismantling of the political fervor and everyday activity that once filled the now empty space. The military as a site of female opportunity, talent development, and collectivity, as well as oppression, is demolished in the push toward market reform, demobilization, and privatization.

她继续创作这个系列，又增添了几件作品。《如果我们的工厂还在?》（图 7.03）源于她对自己军队工作单位内一座工厂拆除过程的录像与摄影记录。与其他关注中国城市地貌大规模翻建的艺术家一样，雷燕用相机探索物质变迁的场所。她的图像为这种当下主义的记录方式带来了时间性、历史与记忆的问题。她再次把自己放入画面，但这一次，她更像未来毁灭全景图中的一名来自过去的迷彩观察者。她镜头下的工厂——一个曾经组织和界定社会生活的机构空间——弥漫着失落感：这来自她向它提出的问题，来自所有格" 我们的"，也来自她经过数码处理的幽灵般现身。她以微缩身形举着望远镜站在瓦砾之间，见证着曾经充满这片如今空荡空间的政治热情与日常活动被拆解。军队作为女性获得机会、发展才能和集体归属之地，同时也是压迫之地，在市场化改革、裁军与私有化的推进中被拆除。

What If Woman Were Written by the Book? shifts to a sociological investigation of reform-era femininity produced out of and against previous norms, retrospectively framed as having unnaturally suppressed an essential femininity. For this piece, Lei Yan photographed the covers of popular books for sale on the streets of Kunming with titles containing the word "woman." An inordinate number of them addressed issues related to health, beauty, sexuality, and family, positioning women as consumers of domestic pleasures rather than producers in the public sphere. She digitally montaged them together to form a black-and-white mosaic, over which the English word woman in capital letters floats as a layered mask that reveals the gaudy colors of the book covers below. The question of the piece's title suggests the disciplining of woman into a particular subject position by this proliferating abundance of material on her, while also holding open in its grammatical construction a gap between signifier and signified, in which the signifiers do not wholly make the signified in its image.

《如果女人按书本来塑造?》转向对改革时代女性气质的社会学考察：这种女性气质是在先前规范之内并针对先前规范生产出来的，而那些规范又被回溯性地框定为曾不自然地压抑了一种本质性

的女性气质。为此，雷燕拍摄了昆明街头出售的畅销书封面，书名中都含有” 女人” 一词。其中相当多涉及健康、美貌、性与家庭，把女性定位为家庭乐趣的消费者，而非公共领域中的生产者。她用数码技术把它们蒙太奇式地拼成黑白马赛克，上面浮着大写的英文单词 woman，像一层叠置的面具，透出下方书封艳俗的色彩。作品标题的疑问暗示：铺天盖地、不断增殖的关于女人的材料，正把女人规训进特定的主体位置；而标题的语法构造同时保持着能指与所指之间的缝隙——能指并不能在其形象中完全制造所指。

Bullet Shot through a Young Heart

子弹穿过年轻的心

来源位置：246, 247

In 2002, following her What If series, Lei Yan created another digital photographic piece titled Bullet Shot through a Young Heart after a return trip to Laoshan, where she had served as a military nurse during the Sino-Vietnamese War. This prolonged series of conflicts along China’s border with Vietnam began with a bloody month in 1979 that left tens of thousands on both sides dead and injured. The war pitted, in almost a 180-degree turn, former socialist allies against one another. Cold War geopolitical alignments and the ideological battles of the Sino-Soviet split begun in the 1960s played out in deadly ways for Chinese and Vietnamese soldiers and civilians. After the Communist victory of the Viet Cong in 1975, a postcolonial, pro-Soviet regime was established in Vietnam. In neighboring Cambodia, the Chinese backed the Khmer Rouge. When their troops attacked ethnic Vietnamese in Cambodia and threatened the border, Vietnam counterattacked in a conflict that led to the deposing of Maoist client-leader Pol Pot. The Chinese retaliated with the 1979 invasion that launched the Sino-Vietnamese War. Border skirmishes continued throughout the 1980s until relations between the two countries finally normalized in the early 1990s. A devastating battle occurred at Laoshan in 1984, during Lei Yan’s deployment, and 959 Chinese soldiers and support personnel were buried there in the Malipo Martyrs Cemetery. Tombstone inscriptions indicate that many of those buried had enlisted only months before dying young, between the ages of sixteen and twenty. Upon returning to Laoshan almost twenty years later, Lei Yan noted that the rebranding of the area as a vacation destination remained haunted by Malipo: “I climbed to the top of the cemetery. Backlit, the tombstones appeared like a group of soldiers in uniform. A gust of wind swept by, and a chill struck through me, like a bullet shot through the tombstones and the spirits underneath. It shot through my young heart, through time and space, through memory, and through peace.”[21]

2002 年，完成《如果》系列之后，雷燕重返老山，随后创作了另一件数码摄影作品《子弹穿过年轻的心》。她曾在中越战争期间作为军队护士驻守老山。中国与越南边境上这场旷日持久的冲突系列，始于 1979 年血腥的一个月，双方数万人死伤。战争几乎来了个一百八十度大转弯，让昔日的社会主义盟友兵戎相见。冷战地缘政治格局与 1960 年代开始的中苏分裂意识形态斗争，以致命的方式落在中国和越南的士兵与平民身上。1975 年越共取得胜利后，越南建立起一个后殖民、亲苏的政权。在邻国柬埔寨，中国支持红色高棉。当红色高棉军队袭击柬埔寨境内的越南族并威胁边境时，越南反击，冲突导致受毛主义阵营扶植的领导人波尔布特被推翻。中国以 1979 年的入侵进行报复，中越战争由此爆发。边境冲突贯穿整个 1980 年代，直到 1990 年代初两国关系最终正常化。1984 年，雷燕驻防期间，老山发生了一场毁灭性的战斗，959 名中国士兵和支援人员葬于麻栗坡烈士陵园。墓碑铭文显示，许多死者入伍仅数月便阵亡，年仅十六到二十岁。近二十年后重返老山时，雷燕注意到，该地区被重新包装为度假目的地，却仍被麻栗坡的幽灵萦绕：”我爬到了陵园顶上。逆光中，墓碑看上去像一队身着军装的士兵。一阵风扫过，寒意刺透了我，像一颗子弹穿过墓碑和下面的亡灵。它穿过我年轻的心，穿过时间和空间，穿过记忆，也穿过和平。”[21]

Bullet Shot through a Young Heart (figure 7.04) is a triptych of three photographs, each tinted a single color, which hung side by side resemble the bars of an exploded national flag. In the central, black-and-white image, superimposed layers of tombstones crowd the frame. While the Malipo tombstones are uniform in height and shape and laid out in straight, uniform rows, Lei digitally varied their size to create an overlapping pattern of haptic replication. Some recede into the background, others rise to the surface, creating an overall sensation of floating upward and outward, an otherworldly irruption of the past into the present. In the images that flank it, tourist snapshots of the cemetery are montaged together in an almost abstract pattern; the actual subject of the photos can only be discerned on close inspection. The tinting of one red and the other green suggests either the demarcation of political bodies on either side of a border or the division between a bloody past and a verdant future. In an installation of the piece in 2011 at the Suzhou Creek Art Center in Shanghai, the three photographs were hung on the white wall of a gallery with a concrete floor and florescent lighting. A line of text ran the entire length of adjacent walls, to the left and right of the image, listing diplomatic details of Chinese-Vietnamese relations from 1950 to 2000, from alliance to conflict to normalization.

《子弹穿过年轻的心》（图 7.04）是一组三联照片，每幅染成单色，并排悬挂时像一面炸裂国旗的色带。中央的黑白图像中，层层叠叠的墓碑挤满画面。麻栗坡的墓碑原本高度、形状统一，排列成笔直的队列，雷燕用数码手段改变其大小，制造出相互重叠、触感般的复制图案。有些退入背景，有些浮向表面，整体产生一种向上、向外漂浮的感觉，像是过去幽灵般闯入现在。两侧的图像把陵园的游客快照蒙太奇式拼成近乎抽象的图案，只有细看才能辨认照片的实际对象。一幅染红、一幅染绿，暗示着边界两侧政治身体的划界，或血染的过去与苍翠未来之间的分野。2011 年，这件作品在上海苏州河艺术中心展出时，三幅照片挂在画廊白墙上，下面是水泥地面，头顶是荧光灯。一条文字沿两侧相邻墙壁的整个长度延伸，在图像左右列出 1950 年至 2000 年间中越关系的外交细节，从结盟、冲突到正常化。

Bullet Shot through a Young Heart brings back to public consciousness the camouflaged history of loss in what is now often remembered only as a forgotten war. It serves as a meta-ideologizing return to a 1986 color print Lei Yan created after her deployment to the border. Southern Border Dream (plate 17) depicts her longing for peace and for her young son from whom she was separated during her service. Although the woman at the battlefront reverses the gender positions in the classical lament of separation when a conscripted son leaves his mother, she has not been liberated from the sacrifice required by militarism. Only in sleep can the exhausted solider, arm and head draped over her medical supply kit, generate the glowing vision that staves off the black grid at her back. Against that abstraction—the entombing grate of a bunker, the emplotting matrix of history—her dream radiates outward in a ring of orange and red. The motif that encircles the soldier features a mythical mother clothed in the flowing robe of an immortal and surrounded by a flock of doves. She reaches for her child, serenades him, and finally holds him in her arms. Almost twenty years later, that dream returns, not in the guise of an idealized woman soldier whose service and sacrifice is justified by visions of peace, but in her challenge to the national diplomatic narrative by remembering the untold young lives the conflict laid waste to. It also marks Lei Yan's position as an artist in southwestern China, with its historical and shifting economic and cultural relations with bordering Southeast Asian nations.

《子弹穿过年轻的心》把被伪装起来的丧失历史重新带回公共意识——这场战争如今往往只被记得为一场被遗忘的战争。它是一次元意识形态化的回归，回到雷燕驻守边境后于 1986 年创作的一幅

彩色版画。《南疆之梦》（图版 17）描绘她在服役期间与年幼儿子分离时对和平、对儿子的思念。尽管这位身处前线的女性颠倒了古典离别哀歌中应征入伍的儿子离开母亲时的性别位置，她并未从军国主义所要求的牺牲中获得解放。只有在睡梦中，这位疲惫的士兵——手臂和头伏在医疗包上——才能生出那团挡住背后黑色网格的辉光。在那片抽象——掩体的墓穴般格栅、历史的情节化矩阵——之前，她的梦以橙红色的光环向外辐射。环绕士兵的图案中，一位神话中的母亲身穿飘逸的仙人衣袍，周围是一群白鸽。她伸手去够自己的孩子，为他哼唱摇篮曲，最后把他抱在怀里。近二十年后，那个梦回来了，但不再是借理想化女兵的形象——她的服役与牺牲由和平幻象来辩护——而是借雷燕对国家外交叙事的挑战：她记住了那场冲突所摧毁的无数无名年轻生命。这也标明了雷燕作为中国西南艺术家的位置，那里与接壤的东南亚国家之间有着历史上的、不断变化的经济与文化关系。

Wang Nanming, the curator of Lei Yan's 2011 solo show, has asserted that her work breaks through the marginalizing category of nüxing yishu because of its overt political engagement. In an attempt to revitalize this theoretical language, he coins the term kuanüxingzhuyi yishu, translated as transfeminist art. He writes, "In trans-feminist art, women constitute a vital political power in the public sphere and are capable of discussing all sorts of issues of civic politics. Lei's photograph series, Bullet Shot through the Young Heart, fights against the female identity superimposed upon female artists by Chinese modernity."[22] Wang's use of the prefix "trans" emphasizes crossing and questioning boundaries, public and private, male and female, East and West, and the ways these categories are mapped onto one another. It suggests how art by Chinese women moves across and into local and global debates about art and politics. It also implies a new category of art that supersedes gendered binaries and forms of power, demonstrating a progressive logic similar to that of postfeminism. This latter claim that feminism is over and done—that its demands for justice have already been achieved or actually hold women back, or that Western-style gender equity need only be exported to other, less enlightened parts of the world—willfully ignores ongoing and intersectional forms of social hierarchy.[23] Another understanding of Wang's term of transfeminism emerges, however, if we consider that he arrives at it through his interpretation of work by He Chengyao and Lei Yan. The emphasis then shifts from overcoming feminism to thinking transhistorically across feminist movements, debates, and ruptures over the long twentieth century, in which women as a propositional category capable of shifting mass consciousness and as a collectivity of living social actors have since the beginning of Chinese modernity constituted "a vital political power in the public sphere." The irony of the progressive-minded neologism authored by the male critic thus becomes its dependence on artists whose work is political not in spite of but because they are women who have focused a critical eye on the historical and political genealogies of gender that have caught and enabled them. It is through identification with and interrogation of subjects of Chinese modernity, the woman solider, military artist, and woman artist, that Lei Yan emerges as what Wang labels a transfeminist artist.

王南溟是雷燕 2011 年个展的策展人，他断言，由于雷燕作品中明显的政治介入，它突破了" 女性艺术" 这一边缘化范畴。为了复兴这套理论语言，他创造了" 跨女性主义艺术"（kuanüxingzhuyi yishu）一词，英译为 transfeminist art。他写道：" 在跨女性主义艺术中，女性构成公共领域中一股重要的政治力量，能够讨论公民政治的各种问题。雷燕的摄影系列《子弹穿过年轻的心》，对抗中国现代性强加于女性艺术家的女性身份。"[22] 王南溟使用前缀" 跨"，强调穿越和质疑边界——公共与私人、男性与女性、东方与西方——以及这些范畴相互映射的方式。它暗示中国女性的艺术如何穿越并进入关于艺术与政治的本地和全球争论。它也意味着一种超越性别二元与权力形式的新艺术范畴，展现出与后女性主义相似的进步逻辑。后一种主张——女性主义已经结束，其正义要

求已经实现，或实际上阻碍了女性，或者西方式的性别平等只需输出到世界上其他不那么开化的地方——刻意无视持续存在且相互交织的社会等级形式。[23] 然而，如果我们注意到王南溟是通过对何成瑶和雷燕作品的解读得出这一术语的，那么对他所谓" 跨女性主义" 的另一种理解便浮现出来。此时重点不再是克服女性主义，而是跨历史地思考漫长二十世纪中的女性主义运动、争论与断裂；在这一视野中，女性作为能够推动群众意识的命题性范畴，也作为活生生的社会行动者的集体，自中国现代性肇始以来一直构成" 公共领域中的一股重要政治力量"。于是，这位男性批评家所创的进步主义新词的讽刺之处，恰在于它依赖于这些艺术家——她们的作品之所以具有政治性，不是尽管她们是女性，而是因为她们是女性，而且她们把批判的目光投向性别的历史与政治谱系——这些谱系既束缚她们，也为她们提供行动的可能。正是通过认同并质询中国现代性的主体——女兵、军旅艺术家和女性艺术家——雷燕才成为王南溟所称的跨女性主义艺术家。

Arrested Ephemerality

被截停的短暂性

来源位置：250

Lei Yan's meditation on national, revolutionary iconography continued as she subjected objects from its corpus to material transmutation. Her works in ice, cloth, and paper capture the transience of image worlds. They arrest the process of disappearing, of being made ephemeral. They explore the contradiction between social idealism and social engineering. They evoke the volatile relationship between personhood and thingness, in which people can be treated as disposable, reproducible things, as much as things can be enchanted with humanity and life. In Arjun Appadurai's conceit, "All things are congealed moments in a longer social trajectory."[24] Lei's experiments explore the social lives of things as congealed moments in a longer trajectory of cumulative history, in which revolutionary collectivity serves as the substrate for a politics of market desire and efficiency. Her return to her military past challenges the soft-glow feminization of revolution in the avant-garde guise of come-hither Red Guards (see figure 1.01) and the liberal subject often assumed in Western feminist thought and art. It connects past fields of disaster to those that persist in the present.

雷燕对国家革命图像学的沉思仍在继续，她让这套图像语汇中的物件经历物质转化。她的冰、布、纸作品捕捉图像世界的短暂性。它们截停了消失、被化为短暂之物的过程。它们探索社会理想主义与社会工程之间的矛盾。它们唤出人格与物性之间不稳定的关系：人可以像物一样被当作一次性、可复制的东西，物也可以被人性与生命赋魅。用阿尔君 • 阿帕杜莱的比喻来说，" 一切事物都是更长社会轨迹中的凝结时刻。"[24] 雷燕的实验探索物的社会生活，将它们视为更长累积历史轨迹中的凝结时刻；在这一轨迹中，革命集体性成为市场欲望与效率政治的基础。她对军旅过去的回归，挑战了先锋派表征中那种挑逗姿态的红卫兵式的、对革命的柔光女性化（见插图 1.01），也挑战了西方女性主义思想与艺术中常预设的自由主义主体。它把过去的灾难场域与延续至今的灾难场域连接起来。

In 2006, Lei Yan created her Frozen Red series. She froze personal military insignias—pins, badges, medals, a Red Guard armband, a folded military jacket, Mao's little red book—in blocks of ice and photographed them. The images are titled according to the year of the preserved object, such as her Red Guard armband from 1969 or her Bayi (eight-one) badge from 1985 after her Sino-Vietnamese War service.[25] The interplay between lighting and imperfections in the ice produces different effects. A red flag pin glows ethereally just under the slick surface of ice. A round badge falls into its depths, with Mao's face on it blurred and opaque. The folded jacket of Lei's dress uniform, with its distinctive lapels marking it as that of a woman soldier, lies shiny and stiff in encrusted ice. After photographing the frozen jacket in her studio, she transported the slab of ice to the edge of the city and erected it at the bottom of a slope covered in green foliage. Unnamed Tomb (plate 18), the photographic record of this ritual of mourning, documents a ghostly sentinel surrounded by leafy groundcover. It momentarily preserves and remembers the possibilities, the woman soldier and her talent development, as well as the losses, of life and revolutionary belief, as her tombstone melts into a forgotten landscape.

2006 年，雷燕创作了《冰封的红色》系列。她把个人的军旅徽记——领花、像章、奖章、红卫兵袖标、叠好的军装、毛主席语录——冻在冰块里，然后拍摄下来。这些图像按被保存物品的年份命名，例如她 1969 年的红卫兵袖标，或 1985 年中越战争服役后的八一徽章。[25] 光线与冰中瑕疵的相互作用产生不同效果。一枚红旗像章在光滑的冰面下发出空灵的光。一枚圆形像章沉入冰的深处，上面的毛泽东面孔模糊而不透明。雷燕军礼服的外套叠放着，其独特翻领表明这是一名女兵的军装，在结霜的冰中闪着光，僵直不动。在工作室拍完冰冻的军装后，她把那块冰运到城市边缘，竖立在一片绿荫覆盖的坡地底部。《无名之墓》（图版 18）记录了这场哀悼仪式，拍下一名幽灵般的哨兵，周围是茂密的叶被。它短暂地保存并记住女兵及其才华发展的可能性，也记住生命与革命信念的失落，而她的墓碑正融入一片被遗忘的风景。

In a subsequent series titled Bullet Shot through a Young Heart II, Lei Yan froze old photographs of life on the Sino-Vietnamese front and then rephotographed them. The ice warps and fissures the original images: soldiers carrying supplies and loading tanks guns, the corner of a sandbag bunker, a dark hole in a white concrete structure with "tomb of nine female heroes" scrawled above it. In the thirty-six photographs of a series from 2007, Frozen Youth, Lei hones in on her own military career. Frozen Youth, No. 26 (figure 7.05), for example, features an ice-encased black-and-white photograph of the artist ten months after she joined the army. The face of the rifle-bearing teenage girl in uniform appears, through the refraction of light through ice, partly doubled. The unpredictability of the freezing process produces, by her own account, a remove from history that allows for observation of the past and consideration of it in relation to the contemporary moment, not unlike her binoculars in the What If images. The crystalline clarity of ice reflects the purity of collective spirit and sacrifice that were strong ideological elements of her military training but also sealed her off from other ways of thinking.[26]

Lei Yan's use of old photos in these two series followed a 1990s trend examined by Wu Hung in "The 'Old Photo Craze' and Contemporary Chinese Art." The low-budget, mass-produced serial Lao Zhaopian (Old photos), launched in 1996, gave its readers a platform to publish everyday photographs accompanied by written reflections. Wu argues that Lao Zhaopian served as a vehicle for "constructing a different type of history—history as collage and chance result, and as the synthetic voice of a multitude of amateur authors."[27] In turning to the use of old photos by Chinese contemporary artists, he identifies three approaches: works that represent memories of major, often suppressed historical events such as the Cultural Revolution; works that construct ordinary, personal histories; and works in which photos appear as "ruins" reflecting the instability of historical memory.[28] Lei Yan's Frozen Youth employs all three of these approaches at once.[29] The series assembles an ordinary, personal history of participation in suppressed historical events meant to produce collective identification, including the Cultural Revolution and the Sino-Vietnamese War.[30] It preserves these forgotten memories in a way that captures the magnifying and obscuring effects of the preservation process. It seizes on the multivalent visual idexicality of old photos.

雷燕在这两个系列中使用老照片，呼应了巫鸿在《" 老照片热" 与当代中国艺术》中考察的 1990 年代潮流。1996 年创刊的低成本、大众化系列读物《老照片》，为读者提供了发表日常照片并附文字感想的平台。巫鸿认为，《老照片》是" 建构另一种历史——作为拼贴与偶然结果的历史，作为众多业余作者合成声音的历史" 的载体。[27] 在考察中国当代艺术家使用老照片的方式时，他辨认出三种路径：表现对重大、往往遭压抑的历史事件（如文化大革命）之记忆的作品；建构普通个人历史的作品；以及照片作为" 废墟" 出现、反映历史记忆之不稳定性的作品。[28] 雷燕的《冰封的青春》同时采用了这三种路径。[29] 该系列汇集了一部普通的个人史，其中参与的是那些旨在制造集体认同、却遭压抑的历史事件，包括文化大革命和中越战争。[30] 它保存这些被遗忘的记忆，同时捕捉保存过程本身的放大与遮蔽效应。它抓住了老照片多价的视觉指示性。

Moving on to the medium of cloth, Lei Yan created a series of soft sculptures titled Camouflage Production (figure 7.06), which grew out of her obsession with the material she wore for thirty years as a soldier. While camouflage ostensibly provides cover and protection for military personnel on the battlefield, it also produces a uniform, national body to which other forms of identification are subordinated. Lei likens its patterning to the mixed, patchwork identities of those such as herself who have lived through multiple political movements in China. The fabric is also a global commodity entangled in the hierarchical, gendered relations of outsourced labor and related political battles over whether national military uniforms should be produced overseas.[31] Lei's sculptures crafted out of camouflage include daily-use items, such as kettles, teacups, cooking utensils, vases, sewing machines, telephones, and laptop computers. The gleaming utilitarian surface of industrially produced objects, which in the model kitchen turned battlefield once signified Cold War narratives of surpassing the enemy, now appear handmade, floppy, and rumpled. As readymade replicas cut from a textile developed for combat, they parody the symbolic myth-making power of things.

转向布这一媒介，雷燕创作了一系列题为《迷彩生产》的软雕塑（图 7.06），其源于她对她作为士兵穿了三十年的材料的迷恋。迷彩表面上为战场上的军人提供掩蔽与保护，同时也生产出一种统一的、国家的身体，其他形式的认同都从属于它。雷燕把迷彩图案比作像她这样经历过中国多场政治运动者混杂、拼贴式的身份。这种面料也是一种全球商品，纠缠于外包劳动的等级化、性别化关系，以及关于国家军服是否应在海外生产的政治争斗。[31] 雷燕用迷彩制作的雕塑包括日用品，如水壶、茶杯、炊具、花瓶、缝纫机、电话和笔记本电脑。工业化生产物品那光亮的实用表面——在样板厨房变成战场的年代，它曾意味着超越敌人的冷战叙事——如今显得手工、松软而皱巴。作为用为战斗开发的纺织品裁出的现成品复制品，它们戏仿了物的象征神话制造力。

Lei Yan's reference to domestic space and use of needlework resonate with works often included in a global canon of feminist art, such as the Womanhouse project that Judy Chicago hoped to re-create with Chinese interlocutors, but Lei injects these now familiar tropes with the Chinese history of woman soldier/art soldier. In I Love Kitchen, camouflage items cover gallery walls in a random, almost haphazard way.[32] This installation amasses and scatters across white walls the signs of household containment and geopolitical conflict; frenzied materialism and national sacrifice; domestic and global economies. Its chaotic arrangement suggests the dual frontlines the modern Chinese woman has faced: the double duty of political and domestic labor. Tasked with both symbolic representation of the nation and sociobiological reproduction of the family, she has been mobilized and demobilized, pulled into public production and returned to the kitchen, according to the needs of the state.[33] At the catachrestic conjunction of woman soldier/art soldier/woman artist, Lei Yan confronts the double bind of either serving the nation, regardless of its repressions, or being stuck in "inner quarters" of domestic introspection. The enthusiastically titled I Love Kitchen, which spoofs patriotic love of country and the idea of domestic bliss, stitches together public and private, as domains that are not dichotomous but differentially constructed through each other.

雷燕对家庭空间的指涉和对针线活的使用，与全球女性主义艺术经典中常收录的作品产生共鸣，例如朱迪·芝加哥希望与中国对话者一起重建的"女人屋"计划；但雷燕为这些如今已为人熟知的意象注入了女兵 / 艺术战士的中国历史。在《我爱厨房》中，迷彩物品以随意、近乎杂乱的方式覆盖画廊墙面。[32] 这件装置把家庭禁锢与地缘冲突的符号、狂热的物质主义与国家牺牲、家庭经济与全球经济，积聚并散布在白墙之上。其混乱布置暗示中国现代女性面临的双重前线：政治劳动与家务劳动的双重职责。她既被要求承担国家的象征表征，又承担家庭的社会生物学再生产，于是随着国家需要被动员、被复员，被拉入公共生产，又被送回厨房。[33] 在女兵 / 艺术战士 / 女性艺术家这一词语误用式的交汇处，雷燕直面双重束缚：要么服务于国家，不论其压迫；要么困于家庭内省的内闱。那个热情洋溢的标题《我爱厨房》戏仿了对国家的爱国之爱与家庭幸福生活的观念，把公共与私人缝合在一起，视为并非二分、而是通过彼此差异化建构的领域。

After ice and cloth, Lei Yan began sculpting objects out of paper, producing ghostlike facsimiles that evoke the absent human presence of those who once wore or carried these things. Her 2011 series, A Place Where Dream Starts (figure 7.07), consists of objects from everyday military life: cap, sneakers, artillery belt, cups, canteen, and handheld missiles. Fashioned after the things she once had an intimate material relationship with, they are reminiscent of traditional Chinese funerary offerings, paper objects burned to accompany the dead into the afterworld. The dream implied by the title and the ethereal quality of the spot-lit sculptures suggest the reveries of youth and idealism. Their light, crumpled paper surfaces take recognizable shape and simultaneously make it appear insubstantial. The dream then becomes one of redemption for those lost to past worldings and the work of art that set up those worlds and made them visible, tangible, desirable, material.

This meta-ideological meditation on her military past emerged from a piece Lei Yan created two year prior. The question of its title How Do I Protect You? (figure 7.08) is posed to the children who died en masse in the 8.0-magnitude earthquake that hit the Sichuan counties of Wenchuan and Beichuan on May 12, 2008. Shoddy construction of classrooms and dormitories amplified the natural disaster's death toll. Collapsed school buildings crushed and killed thousands of students, many of whose bodies were never recovered. Their grieving parents declared the engineering of the buildings, some recently constructed, not just tofu but tofu dregs. Those who demanded a count of the number of student deaths and investigation into corrupt officials and contractors who had taken shortcuts were silenced in the name of stability. From this landscape of disaster, official media broadcast a story of humanitarian aid and the reestablishment of "harmonious society" after an exceptional event.[34] Social critics attempted to peel back the veneer of this picture and the loss it obscured. The Wen-chuan earthquake, like other social crises and controversies, became a touchstone for artists negotiating a new market-driven valuation of art, its traffic in images, and a legacy of aesthetic commitment to social commentary and collective political struggle. Ai Weiwei, for example, responded to the student deaths with projects that blended the creation of modernist art objects on a spectacular scale with online social activism, performative confrontations with Chinese police and legal systems, and documentary filmmaking. While the international place of prominence given to Ai's activities has tended to eclipse other work, he was one among many artists moved by this and related scenes of chronic disaster amid an everyday landscape of environmental degradation and economic inequality.[35]

这场对她军旅过去的元意识形态沉思，源自雷燕两年前创作的一件作品。其标题《我如何保护你?》（图 7.08）中的问题，是向 2008 年 5 月 12 日四川汶川、北川 8.0 级地震中成群罹难的孩子提出的。教室与宿舍的劣质建筑放大了自然灾害的死亡人数。倒塌的校舍压死数千名学生，许多人遗体始终未能找到。悲痛欲绝的家长宣称，这些建筑——有些还是新近建成的——不只是豆腐，而是豆腐渣。那些要求统计学生死亡人数、调查偷工减料的腐败官员与承包商的人，被以稳定之名噤声。官方媒体从这片灾难景观中播出的，是一个人道主义救援的故事，以及在非常事件之后重建" 和谐社会" 的故事。[34] 社会批评者试图剥开这幅画面的表皮，揭示它所遮蔽的丧失。汶川地震像其他社会危机与争议一样，成为艺术家们处理的试金石，涉及艺术在市场驱动下的新估值、图像的流通，以及美学上致力于社会批判与集体政治斗争的遗产。例如，艾未未以多种项目回应学生之死，把壮观尺度的现代主义艺术物品创作，与网络社会行动、与中国警察和法律系统对抗的行为表演，以及纪录片制作结合起来。尽管艾未未的活动所获得的国际显要位置往往遮蔽了其他作品，他只是在环境退化与经济不平等的日常景观中，被这幕及类似慢性灾难场景所触动的众多艺术家之一。[35]

From a distance, Lei's installation of How Do I Protect You? looks like a pile of trash. On closer inspection, it becomes apparent that she has meticulously re-created the site of a collapsed school building. Working with translucent white filter paper, needle, and thread, she sculpted crumpled walls, pillars, and furniture. Small details buried within pull viewers closer, implicating them as voyeuristic witnesses to a crime scene. Shoes, pencil boxes, and backpacks spill out from the rubble. Small black-and-white student photographs are tucked into the front pockets of the backpacks (figure 7.09). Tiny paper flowers on long, weedy stems sprout from the scattered personal effects. For the parents of children whose bodies were never recovered, these objects remained all they could collect. Some assembled possessions pulled from the rubble together with stuffed animals, snacks, and bottled drinks to builds altars to their disappeared children in front of school ruins. These ritual offerings, which inverted the Chinese practice of ancestor worship, with a parent feeding the memory of a child instead of the other way around, insisted on the existence of lost lives the state tried to erase with money offered for families' silence. Lei Yan's hand-sewn re-creation of everyday use objects reenchants them in a similar way, while her choice of materials echoes the condemnatory criticism of poorly constructed buildings as tofu dregs. These ghost objects, rather than easing spiritual passage like their ritual counterpart of joss paper burned in veneration of the dead, stand in instead for life after life in a field of death and disaster, where the unequal distribution of life and death are justified by the intertwined projects of late socialism and late liberalism. The paper sculpture series that followed include A Place Where Dream Starts and On the Road, a cluster of bags and suitcases arranged on the cement floor of an empty factory space. Together these three-dimensional explorations in the flimsy medium of paper evoke the precariousness of life—the ubiquitous traffic between personhood and thingness—for the young soldier, the migrant worker, the lost child, those unaccounted for and gone missing again and again.

从远处看，雷燕的装置《我如何保护你?》像一堆垃圾。靠近观察，才会发现她一丝不苟地重建了一栋倒塌校舍的现场。她用半透明的白色滤纸、针和线，塑造出皱褶的墙壁、柱子和家具。埋在其中的细小细节把观者拉近，使他们成为犯罪现场的窥视证人。鞋子、铅笔盒和书包从瓦砾中溢出。小小的黑白学生照塞在书包前袋里（图 7.09）。细长、杂草般的茎上开着纸花，从散落的私人物品中钻出。对于遗体始终未能找到的孩子的父母来说，这些物品仍是他们所能收集的一切。有些家长把从瓦砾中找出的物品与毛绒玩具、零食、瓶装饮料摆在一起，在校舍废墟前为他们失踪的孩子搭建祭坛。这些仪式供品颠倒了中国祖先崇拜的实践，变成父母喂养对孩子的记忆，而不是反过来；它们坚持那些被国家试图用封口费抹除的逝去生命的存在。雷燕对手缝日常用物的再创造，以类似方式使它们重新赋魅；而她选择的材料，呼应了把劣质建筑斥为豆腐渣的谴责性批评。这些幽灵般的物件不像其仪式对应物——为敬奉死者而焚烧的纸钱——那样帮助灵魂过渡，而是代表死亡与灾难场域中一个生命又一个生命的存在；在那里，生与死的不平等分配，由晚期社会主义与晚期自由主义相互交织的工程所辩护。随后的纸雕系列包括《梦开始的地方》和《在路上》——一组袋子和手提箱，摆在一处空置厂房的水泥地上。这些以轻薄纸张为媒介的三维探索，共同唤出生命的不稳定性——人格与物性之间无处不在的流转——为年轻士兵、民工、失去的孩子，为那些一次又一次下落不明、消失无踪的人。

Monumental Ephemeral

纪念碑式 / 短暂性

来源位置：257, 258

At the turn of the millennium, a new culture industry took up contemporary art as a way to advance China's national image on the global stage. The state enlisted the names and talents of "dissident" figures who had spent years abroad or whose work had once been censored. Artists like Ai Weiwei and Cai Guoqiang and filmmakers like Zhang Yimou and Jia Zhangke contributed to the monumental spectacles of the 2008 Beijing Olympics and 2010 Shanghai World Expo. These twenty-first-century spectacles of awe-inspiring national achievement continued a legacy of form that runs through imperial and Maoist China: of artworks, buildings, and rituals executed on a grand scale. Large-scale structures from the Great Wall to the Monument to the People's Heroes in Tiananmen Square to the Bird's Nest Stadium are invested with the power of monumentality, the control and shaping of collective memory. As Wu Hung notes in an essay on the subject, "The Latin root of monumentality means recalling and admonishing. In order to exercise the function of admonition, official monuments always are awesome, majestic, and inhuman structures; their huge mass controls the public space in which they are placed."[36] As a challenge to this function, Chinese avant-garde artists in the 1980s and 1990s experimented with antimonumentality, creating pieces that Wu identifies as either countermonuments or attempts to achieve antimonuments. Hence, the large number of experimental art projects on the Great Wall. The problem with an antimonumental critique of monumental power is that it often slides toward that which it aims to deconstruct. The propensity of Chinese experimental artists to make large-scale pieces that command the world's attention perpetuates the socialist mandate to forge a new political order through cultural production and revolution. This like-sized response to the hegemony of art as state politics and to the global cultural order of things risks mimicking and reproducing the spectacular society it purports to critique. It engages in a politics of scale that continues to world in powerful ways.

世纪之交，一种新的文化产业把当代艺术当作在全球舞台上推进中国国家形象的方式。国家征用了那些曾在海外多年、或作品曾被审查的" 异见" 人物的名字与才华。艾未未、蔡国强等艺术家，张艺谋、贾樟柯等电影人，参与了 2008 年北京奥运会和 2010 年上海世博会这些纪念碑式的盛景。这些 21 世纪令人惊叹的国家成就景观，延续了一种贯穿帝制中国与毛泽东时代中国的形式遗产：以宏大尺度创作艺术品、建筑与仪式。从长城到天安门广场的人民英雄纪念碑，再到鸟巢体育场，大型结构都被赋予了纪念碑性的力量，即对集体记忆的控制与塑造。正如巫鸿在一篇相关论文中所说：" 纪念碑性（monumentality）的拉丁词根意为回忆与告诫。为了行使告诫功能，官方纪念碑总是令人敬畏、庄严、非人的结构；其巨大的体量控制着它所置身的公共空间。"[36] 作为对这种功能的挑战，1980 年代和 1990 年代的中国先锋艺术家实验反纪念碑性，创作出巫鸿所说的反纪念碑，或试图达成非纪念碑的作品。因此才有大量以长城为题的实验艺术计划。对纪念碑式权力进行反纪念碑批判，问题在于它常常滑向它想要解构的东西。中国实验艺术家偏爱创作吸引世界注意的大型作品，这延续了社会主义的使命：通过文化生产与革命锻造新的政治秩序。这种以同等尺度回应艺术作为国家政治的霸权，以及全球文化物序，可能模仿并再生产它声称批判的景观社会。它参与一种尺度政治，并继续以强大的方式从事世界营造。

Ai Weiwei, who gained local and global distinction through his role as design consultant on the National Stadium for the Beijing Olympics, serves as the most prominent example of this phenomenon, as well as the contradictions that arose during this turning-point period for Chinese contemporary art. Even in his later critique of the Olympics, antagonism to the state, and commitment to art as social activism, his activities assumed an epic scale: in their formal aesthetics, resources commanded for their realization, and international recognition for their bad boy political dissent. In William Callahan's analysis of Ai as a figure of ironic tensions, he observes the mutual dependence of dissidents and officials for "their respective legitimacies and identities," in which "Ai's anti-state oppositional discourse thus tends to reproduce the state even as it resists it."[37] The pieces Ai Weiwei created in response to the Wenchuan earthquake, exhibited in museums around the world, are monumental in scale. They admonish state silence, even as they represent that same nation-state in the international art arena.

艾未未因担任北京奥运会国家体育场设计顾问而获得本地与全球声誉，是这一现象最突出的例子，也是中国当代艺术这一转折时期出现的矛盾的例子。即便在他后来对奥运会的批判、对国家的对抗，以及把艺术当作社会行动的承诺中，他的活动也呈现出史诗般的尺度：形式美学、为实现作品所调动的资源，以及因其坏男孩式的政治异见而获得的国际认可，皆如此。在威廉·卡拉汉把艾未未分析为反讽张力人物的文章中，他观察到异见者与官员" 各自合法性与身份" 的相互依赖：" 艾未未反国家的对抗话语因此往往在抵抗国家的同时再生产国家。"[37] 艾未未为回应汶川地震而创作、在世界各地博物馆展出的作品，在尺度上是纪念碑式的。它们谴责国家的沉默，同时又在国际艺术舞台上表征同一个民族国家。

In Lei Yan's How Can I Protect You?, paper sculptures of backpacks spill out from insubstantial, ghostly rubble. In Ai Weiwei's Remembering, installed in 2009 across the façade of Munich's Haus der Kunst, nine thousand colorful children's backpacks write out in bubbly Chinese characters, "She lived happily in this world for seven years." A Beichuan mother who refused compensation money for her daughter's death wrote this sentence as what she wanted people to remember. For Straight, an installation piece first exhibited in his 2012–13 survey show at the Hirshhorn Museum in Washington DC, Ai purchased thirty-eight tons of mangled rebar salvaged from the earthquake reconstruction zone and hired a team of workers to hammer it straight. He then arranged it in piles of various heights to create a long, rolling landscape of rusted steel ruptured by fault lines. The accompanying wall text read, "The tragic reality of today is reflected in the true plight of our spiritual existence. We are spineless and cannot stand straight." Sichuan Name List (2008–11) records the name, gender, age, school, and class of 5,212 children who perished in the earthquake, information collected by the hundreds of citizen volunteers who responded to Ai Weiwei's online call for an investigation into the student deaths. Installed at the Hirshhorn, the list spanned a massive, curving wall. A monument to the dead and the collective labor it took to document them, it resembles a war memorial. Lei Yan's small rumpled paper sculpture Ten Years of Dying Young, created in 2012, also presents a list. Three flower-strewn tablets record crises of the millennium's first decade with the Wenchuan earthquake inserted into a transnational field of death and injury in combat zones, terrorist actions, industrial accidents, and natural disasters.

在雷燕的《我如何保护你?》中，背包的纸雕从不坚实的、幽灵般的瓦砾中溢出。在艾未未的《铭记》中，九千个彩色儿童书包于 2009 年铺满慕尼黑艺术之家的立面，用圆润的中文字体写出：" 她在这个世界上幸福地生活了七年。" 一位北川母亲拒绝为女儿之死接受赔偿金，她写下这句话，

作为她希望人们记住的内容。在《直》中——这件装置作品首次展出于华盛顿赫希洪博物馆 2012—13 年艾未未回顾展——艾未未购买了从地震重建区回收的三十八吨扭曲钢筋，雇了一队工人把它锤直，然后将其堆成高低不一的垛，构成一片被断层线撕裂的锈蚀钢地景。展墙上的说明文字写道：”今日的悲剧现实，映照出我们精神存在的真实困境。我们毫无脊梁，无法站直。”《四川名单》（2008—11）记录了 5212 名在地震中罹难儿童的名字、性别、年龄、学校和班级；这些信息由数百名公民志愿者收集，他们响应艾未未的网上呼吁，要求调查学生死亡。安装在赫希洪博物馆时，名单铺满一整面巨大的弧形墙。它是一座献给死者的纪念碑，也是记录他们所付出的集体劳动的纪念碑，形似战争纪念碑。雷燕 2012 年创作的小型皱纸雕塑《早逝的十年》也呈现了一份名单。三块散布着花朵的碑板记录了新千年第一个十年的危机，把汶川地震插入一个跨国死亡与伤痛场域——战区、恐怖行动、工业事故与自然灾害。

It would be facile in comparing these works—the monumental and the ephemeral—to reinscribe familiar dichotomies of male/female, liumang/nüxing, public and private. Such a normativizing move would erase the traces of the ephemeral in the monumental and of the monumental in the ephemeral. Considering art by Ai Weiwei and Lei Yan together, while a seeming “impossible reality” in current curatorial rules of the game, makes it possible to see them also as ethnographic fragments of avant-garde/xianfeng cultural transition. As much as Lei Yan’s work inhabits an image world of late Qing and early Republican illustrations of women with binoculars to their eyes, so too is it in relationship with pieces like Ai Weiwei’s Remembering, Straight, and Sichuan Name List. Holding these works together is a way of understanding Chinese contemporary art in the expanded field, putting those marginalized by globalized, professionalized circuits back in and asking what new questions and lines of sight this method of montage opens up. How does a feminist lens highlight the contradictions of an emerging art world and enable a differential consciousness about the shifting role of art—as ideological, institutional, and imaginative—within various configurations of power?

比较这两类作品——纪念碑式的与短暂性的——时，若只是重新刻写男 / 女、流氓 / 女性、公共 / 私人这些熟悉的二分法，便流于肤浅。这种规范化举动会抹去纪念碑中的短暂性痕迹，以及短暂性中的纪念碑性痕迹。把艾未未与雷燕的艺术放在一起考虑，尽管在现行策展游戏规则中看似” 不可能的现实”，却使我们得以把它们也视为 avant-garde / 先锋文化转型的民族志碎片。正如雷燕的作品栖居于晚清民初举望远镜女子的图像世界，它也与艾未未的《铭记》《直》《四川名单》等作品发生关系。把这些作品放在一起，是在扩展场域中理解中国当代艺术的一种方式：把被全球化、专业化循环边缘化的人重新放回去，并追问这种蒙太奇方法开启了什么新问题与新视线。女性主义镜头如何凸显一个新兴艺术世界的矛盾，并使人们形成一种差异意识，去理解艺术——作为意识形态的、制度的与想象的——在各种权力配置中不断变化的角色？

The biographies of these two artists, born within months of each other in the early years of the People's Republic, read in parallel reveal shifts and struggles among what Bourdieau identifies as the fields of cultural production, of power, and of economics or class relations.[38] Ai Weiwei was born in 1957. His father—a poet who had studied in France, endured Guomindang imprisonment, joined Mao at Yan'an, and edited People's Literature—was denounced that same year in the Anti-Rightist Campaign and sent to China's northwest with his family. After seventeen years of exile in Heilongjiang and Xinjiang, they returned to Beijing. In 1978, Ai Weiwei briefly attended the Beijing Film Academy. A red princeling, heir to a patriline of art and politics, vagrancy and imprisonment, he left China for the United States in 1981. For twelve years he lived in New York, where he studied at the Parsons School of Design, befriended Allen Ginsberg, and became a peripatetic photographer of East Village life. Lei Yan was also born in 1957, into the family of a career officer in the People's Liberation Army. She followed her father into the military, studied printmaking as part of her army training, photographed life on the Sino-Vietnamese front, and received advance training at the pla's Arts Academy. When Ai Weiwei became the official Chinese consultant to the Swiss firm designing the Beijing Olympics National Stadium, it seemed like the ultimate tizhi wai (outside-the-system) artist had reversed position in service to a monumental statement of China's arrival on the world stage. When Lei Yan posed "what if" questions to Mao retrospectively adorned with a 1930s female hairstyle, it seemed like the ultimate tizhi nei (inside-the-system) artist had reversed position in a deconstructive tour of the past and its archives.

这两位艺术家都生于中华人民共和国成立后的早期岁月，出生时间相隔数月；并置阅读他们的传记，可以揭示布尔迪厄所说的文化生产场域、权力场域以及经济或阶级关系场域之间的转变与斗争。[38] 艾未未 1957 年出生。他的父亲是一位诗人，曾留学法国，经历国民党监禁，赴延安追随毛泽东，后来主编《人民文学》；就在同一年，他在反右运动中被批判，和家人一起被送往中国西北。在黑龙江和新疆流放十七年后，他们回到北京。1978 年，艾未未曾短暂就读于北京电影学院。作为一个红色太子党——继承着艺术与政治、漂泊与监禁的父系血脉——他于 1981 年离开中国前往美国。在纽约生活的十二年间，他在帕森斯设计学院学习，与艾伦·金斯伯格成为朋友，成为东村生活的游走摄影师。雷燕也生于 1957 年，出身于中国人民解放军职业军官家庭。她追随父亲进入军队，在部队训练中学习版画，在中越前线拍摄生活，并在解放军艺术学院接受高级培训。当艾未未成为瑞士公司设计北京奥运会国家体育场的官方中方顾问时，那个看似最彻底的" 体制外" 艺术家仿佛转变了立场，为一个宣告中国登上世界舞台的纪念碑式作品服务。当雷燕以 1930 年代女性发型追溯性地装扮毛泽东，并提出" 如果" 问题时，那个看似最彻底的" 体制内" 艺术家仿佛转变了立场，展开了一场穿越过去及其档案的解构之旅。

Their unfolding lives and works, shaped by a history in which art and politics were never understood as autonomous realms, briefly approach each other in their responses to Chinese state image management of the 2008 Wenchuan earthquake. Are they part of the same or competing sectors of the field of cultural production? Their reversals in relation to the "system," as well as the depth of their conceptual practices and aesthetic excavations, force a reworking of Bourdieu's analytic framework, which was developed in a bourgeois European context. Art in the Maoist field was theorized as aligned with revolutionary power, rather than in a dominated or inverted relationship with it. It did not tend toward the dominant pole of the field of capitalist class relations; its superstructure was intended to lead the base, to smash colonial and class hierarchy. Chinese contemporary art in the era of late socialism–late liberalism is a field of contradictory historical and ideological forces and of competing institutionalized authorities and economies. This has become the playing field for an artist like Ai Weiwei, imprisoned and embraced by the monumentalizing gestures of canonization. His art commands public museum spaces the world over, exposing (and solidifying) the Chinese state in the name of freedom and progress. The work of Lei Yan, a former pla propagandist working from the edge of the nation and the margins of the international art world, raises the following questions: What spectres of "always already absent present" haunt Ai Weiwei's aesthetic experiments?[39] For whom are these heroic politics of exposure most persuasive? What makes London's Tate Modern broadcast from its rooftop the message "Release Ai Weiwei," rather than "Recognize and compensate the families of lost children" or "The people have suffered from the coalition of government and business"?[40]

他们展开的生命与作品，由一段艺术与政治从未被理解为自主领域的历史所塑造；在回应中国国家对 2008 年汶川地震的图像管理时，二者短暂地彼此接近。他们属于文化生产场域中相同的部分，还是相互竞争的部分？他们相对于" 体制" 的反转，以及他们观念实践的深度与美学挖掘，迫使人们重做布尔迪厄的分析框架——该框架是在欧洲资产阶级语境中发展起来的。在毛泽东时代的场域中，艺术被理论化为与革命权力结盟，而不是与它处于被支配或颠倒的关系。它并不趋向资本主义阶级关系场域的主导极；它的上层建筑意在引领基础，粉碎殖民与阶级等级。晚期社会主义—晚期自由主义时代的中国当代艺术，是一个充满矛盾的历史与意识形态力量、相互竞争的建制化权威与经济的场域。这里已成为像艾未未这样的艺术家的竞技场；他既被经典化过程中的纪念碑化姿态所禁锢，也被其接纳。他的艺术占据全世界公共博物馆空间，以自由与进步之名暴露（并巩固）中国国家。雷燕的作品出自一名前解放军宣传干部之手，她从民族国家的边缘与国际艺术界的边缘工作，提出以下问题：什么样的" 总是已经缺席的在场" 的幽灵萦绕着艾未未的美学实验？[39] 这些英雄式的暴露政治对谁最有说服力？又是什么让伦敦泰特现代美术馆从屋顶发出" 释放艾未未" 的信息，而不是" 承认并赔偿失去孩子的家庭" 或" 人民饱受政府与商业联盟之苦"？[40]

In June 1994, five years after the events of June 4, Ai Weiwei photographed his wife, the artist Lu Qing, in Tiananmen Square. She stands in front of the Gate of Heavenly Peace, her back against the pedestrian barricade on the opposite side of Chang'an Boulevard, far away enough that her head appears next to and the same size as Mao's in the larger-than-life portrait that hangs behind her. Her head cocked to the side and one foot propped up on the metal barricade, she stares casually at the camera while lifting her translucent black skirt with both hands to expose her underwear. In a twist on the socialist use of the female body to expose and attack class enemies, her flippant pin-up pose disregards and diminishes the monumental power of Mao. Although the photograph has since circulated as an early example of Ai Weiwei in "Fuck Off" mode, at the moment of its initial exposure, the question of artistic agency remains open to speculation. Is Ai Weiwei as photographer or Lu Qing as performer the artist? Who is the image made for? A year later Ai Weiwei stood further from the Gate in Tiananmen Square and photographed his own hand flipping a middle finger to Mao's portrait. In Study in Perspective, his raised digit in the foreground takes the place of Lu Qing's body next to the Chairman, looming large beside the portrait, threatening to blot it out. The woman and her conflicted, embodied politics of exposure disappear from the picture. Almost two decades later, Ai Weiwei created a large-scale piece for the 2013 Venice Biennale titled S.A.C.R.E.D. Its six parts—Supper, Accused, Cleansing, Ritual, Entropy, Doubt—depict in realist detail his eighty-one day prison detention in 2011. Large iron boxes, installed in the place of pews in a church turned art gallery, contain half-scale plexiglass dioramas of the incarcerated artist being interrogated, showering, eating, shitting, and sleeping. Spectators can observe these scenes through small glass windows on the sides or tops of the boxes. In a sculptural installation that takes on the weight and scale of history painting, the artist's own body on display becomes the locus of indignity, suffering, and resistance. It is a spectacular form of self-portraiture haunted by a Maoist legacy of charismatic male leadership.

1994 年 6 月，即 6 月 4 日事件五年后，艾未未在天安门广场拍摄了他的妻子、艺术家路青。她站在天安门前，背靠长安街对面的行人护栏，距离足够远，使她的头出现在身后那幅巨型毛泽东画像旁边，且大小相同。她歪着头，一只脚搭在金属护栏上，随意地盯着镜头，同时用双手撩起半透明的黑裙，露出内裤。这是对社会主义利用女性身体来揭露和攻击阶级敌人的一次反转：她轻佻的招贴女郎姿态无视并缩小了毛泽东的纪念碑式权力。尽管这张照片后来作为艾未未" 滚蛋"（Fuck Off）模式的早期例子流传，但在它最初曝光之时，艺术能动性的归属仍有待探究。作为摄影师的艾未未，还是作为表演者的路青，才是艺术家？这张图像是为谁而作？一年后，艾未未站得更远，在天安门广场拍摄自己向毛泽东画像竖中指的手。在《透视研究》中，前景里他竖起的手指取代了路青在主席旁边的身体，在画像旁赫然耸立，几乎要将其遮蔽。女人及其充满冲突的、具身的暴露政治从画面中消失了。近二十年后，艾未未为 2013 年威尼斯双年展创作了一件大型作品《S.A.C.R.E.D.》。它的六个部分——《晚餐》《被告》《清洗》《仪式》《熵》《怀疑》——以写实细节描绘他 2011 年被监禁的八十一天。大型铁箱安装在由教堂改成的美术馆里，取代了长椅，里面装着半比例的有机玻璃立体模型，再现这位被囚艺术家受审、洗澡、进食、排便和睡觉的场景。观众可以通过铁箱侧面或顶部的小玻璃窗观察这些场景。在这件具有历史画重量与尺度的雕塑装置中，艺术家自己的身体成为屈辱、受难与抵抗的展示场所。这是一种奇观式的自画像，被毛泽东时代富有魅力的男性领导遗产所萦绕。

Lei Yan's paper sculptures are similarly haunted but respond to the legacy by a refusal to authoritatively represent. Her arrested objects resist the temporal pull of narrative and modernity's myth of progress. Their empty presence decenters the human subject, drawing attention instead to absences and omissions in normative stories of art, feminism, and nation. Her lightweight sculptures turn away from the tradition of history painting so central to socialist aesthetics and toward the genre of the still life. An evacuated pair of military sneakers was one of the first forms she fashioned out of paper. They give shape to what Norman Bryson analyzes in still life painting as the voiding of individual or idealized human presence: "Still life takes on the exploration of what 'importance' tramples underfoot."[41] Jacques Derrida likewise ruminates on the relationship between subject and object through a still life painting of shoes: "As soon as these abandoned shoes no longer have any strict relationship with a subject borne or bearing/wearing, they become the anonymous, lightened, voided support (but so much the heavier from being abandoned to its opaque inertia) of an absent subject whose name returns to haunt the open form."[42]

雷燕的纸雕塑同样被萦绕，但它回应这份遗产的方式是拒绝权威性再现。她被截停的物件抵抗叙事的时间牵引与现代化的进步神话。它们空无的在场使人类主体去中心化，转而把注意力引向规范性的艺术、女性主义与民族故事中的缺席与遗漏。她轻巧的雕塑背离社会主义美学中如此核心的历史画传统，转向静物画。一双被掏空的军旅运动鞋，是她最早用纸塑造的形态之一。它们赋予诺曼·布列逊在静物画分析中所说的个体或理想化人类在场之清空以形状："静物画承担了对'重要性'所践踏之物的探索。"[41] 雅克·德里达同样通过一幅鞋子静物画来思考主体与客体的关系："一旦这些被遗弃的鞋子不再与任何被承载或承载 / 穿着它们的主体保持严格关系，它们就成为一个缺席主体之匿名、轻盈、被清空的支撑（但因为被遗弃于其不透明的惰性中而沉重得多），这个主体的名字回来萦绕这开放的形式。"[42]

The Hallowed Object

神圣之物

来源位置：262, 263

Lei Yan has continued to work in paper, manipulating, creasing, and sewing the flat material into a surfeit of three-dimensional objects, each of which would readily fit in the hand. For The Hallowed Object, a 2016 solo exhibition in Beijing's Caochangdi art district, she displayed seventy-six sculpted objects en masse, arranged along a narrow shelf the entire length of a gallery wall. The exhibit also included black-and-white photographs of the objects—some taking representational shape, others uncanny in form—as single pieces or in small groupings. A tall, slender cone topped with a five-point star stands forlornly on its own. An upright axe and sickle turn away from each other. A larger assembly of objects (figure 7.10) resembles a domestic still life with bottles, vases, and a candlestick, but it also includes the axe and sickle, a bugle, an antitank missile, and a trench mortar bomb nose down and fins in the air. What might seem to be an ornamental vessel with a handle turns out to be a hand grenade. Eccentrically shaped containers mingle with those of recognizable use. In the long three-dimensional display along the wall, the accumulated abundance of objects becomes a procession, a tableau vivant, even a cityscape. Overproduction, whether of symbolic imagery or industrial goods, is hallowed and hollow. The wrinkled, white shapes vacillate between solid and void. The Chinese title for the series, Shengwu, can also be translated as relic. The reliquary Lei Yan has created, however, does not produce reverence for or the aura of an individual hero. They invoke reflection on cast-off ideals of collectivity and on who or what endures.

雷燕继续用纸创作，通过摆弄、压折和缝纫，把扁平材料变成大量三维物品，每一件都能握在手中。在 2016 年北京草场地艺术区个展《神圣之物》中，她集中展示了七十六件雕塑物品，沿着一面画廊墙全长的窄搁板排列。展览还包括这些物品的黑白照片——有些呈现具象形状，有些形态诡谲——单件或小组合呈现。一只高而细的圆锥顶端顶着五角星，孤零零地立着。一把竖立的斧头与镰刀彼此背对。一组更大的物品（图 7.10）像是一幅家庭静物，有瓶子、花瓶和烛台，但其中也包括斧头与镰刀、一把军号、一枚反坦克导弹，以及一枚弹头朝下、尾翼朝上的迫击炮弹。一个看似带把手的装饰性容器，其实是手榴弹。奇形怪状的容器与用途可辨的容器混杂在一起。在沿墙的长长三维展示中，积聚的丰富物品变成队列、活人画，甚至城市景观。过度生产——无论是象征图像还是工业产品——既神圣又空洞。皱褶的白色形体在实体与虚空之间摇摆。该系列的中文标题" 圣物"，也可以译为 relic（遗物）。然而雷燕创造的这件圣物匣，并不生产对个体英雄的崇敬或灵光。它们引发对集体性这一被丢弃理想的反思，以及对谁或什么得以持存的反思。

Lei Yan takes what is ready-to-hand—techniques of her training as a military artist, badges and photographs of revolutionary identification, the fabric and tools of warfare and subordination—and subjects them to material transmutation.[43] They may resemble their former selves, but they no longer serve a taken-for-granted use in the world. The tool, the symbol, the sign become resistant and ephemeral. Her body of work is not an archive of cultural facts but an artistic repertoire that reflects and returns the remade object back into the world. In her aesthetics of arrested ephemerality, materiality matters, even or especially at its vanishing point, because the thing represents a congealed moment in a longer social trajectory. It registers the process of being caught in the double bind of institutions that purport to represent and protect even as they use up, silence, and make waste of. She invests things with agency and personhood, with a critical historiographical consciousness.

雷燕取用唾手可得之物——她作为军旅艺术家受训的技法、革命认同的徽章与照片、战争与从属关系的织物与工具——让它们经历物质转化。[43] 它们也许仍像原来的自己，但不再承担世上理所当然的用途。工具、象征、符号变得抵抗而短暂。她的全部作品不是文化事实的档案，而是一套艺术实践的形式与方法，映照并把重造之物送回世界。在她那被截停的短暂性美学中，物质性至关重要，甚至尤其在其消失点上，因为物代表着更长社会轨迹中的一个凝结时刻。它记录着被机构双重束缚所捕获的过程——这些机构声称代表并保护，实际上却消耗、噤声并废弃。她以批判性的史学意识赋予物以能动性与人格。

Lei Yan's experiments serve not to admonish but to bring back into consciousness lost lives and camouflaged histories. They exhibit a feminist epistemology of thinking relationally about social hierarchy, aesthetic form, and ideology; about the ongoing production of social abstractions and markings that create inequality and injustice. Her binoculars trained backward, across the field of history, trace feminist sight lines of knowledge, recognition, affiliation, and alliance in which art takes on an ethical dimension, of remembering, of attending to loss and erasure, of taking care. Art becomes less a stable, lasting, authoritative object than the work of sensuous engagement with one's material and social environment.

雷燕的实验不是为了告诫，而是为了把失去的生命与被伪装的历史重新带回意识。它们展示了一种女性主义认识论：在关系性中思考社会等级、美学形式与意识形态，思考那些制造不平等与不公的社会抽象与标记是如何被持续生产出来的。她的望远镜向后调转，穿越历史的场域，描画出知识、承认、归属与联盟的女性主义视线；在其中，艺术承担伦理维度——记忆、关注丧失与抹除、给予关怀。艺术不再是一个稳定、持久、权威的客体，而是与自身物质与社会环境进行感性互动的工作。

In Lei Yan's practice, art is not warfare, but a methodology of making things speak from beyond death to register the disappearance of that taken from us. Her contemplative body of work at the intersection of woman soldier, military artist, and woman artist echoes over a hundred years later the words of anarchist-feminist writer He-Yin Zhen, whose theoretical writings have only recently been pulled out from under the monumental edifice of history. In an essay written in 1907, "On Feminist Antimilitarism," she challenges hawkish Chinese ideals espoused in the name of national self-strengthening. She describes the ideology of male superiority and female inferiority, of social hierarchies and classes, of heaven and earth, as rooted in the long history of militarism and male conscription. She lambasts the condition of women and the common people alike as willing slaves taken advantage of by the government and capitalists. She writes, "It is truly absurd that everyone boasts about becoming a militarized people. There are even a handful of women who ardently hope to become like Mulan or Liang Hongyu. This is especially senseless. Today, in contrast to these sentiments, I will explain why women should be opposed to militarism.... antimilitarism can help the common people seize their own freedom; it can extend protection to all human lives."[44] Lei Yan's practice of art as an iterative ritual of reflection and care, posed in queries of "what if" and "how can I," presents a contrast to the premise of Chinese contemporary art as a mark of global arrival.

在雷燕的实践中，艺术不是战争，而是一种让物在死亡之后发声的方法，以记录那些从我们身边被夺走者的消失。她沉思性的作品位于女兵、军旅艺术家与女性艺术家的交汇处，在一百多年后回响着无政府主义—女性主义作家何殷震的话——她的理论著作直到最近才从历史的纪念碑式大厦下被拉出来。在 1907 年写的一篇文章《论女性主义反军国主义》中，她挑战以民族自强之名宣扬的鹰派中国理想。她把男尊女卑、社会等级与阶级、天与地的意识形态，描述为植根于军国主义与男性征兵的漫长历史。她痛斥妇女与平民同样沦为政府与资本家利用的甘心奴隶。她写道：”人人都夸耀成为军国主义之民，实在荒谬。甚至还有少数女性热切希望成为木兰或梁红玉那样的人。这尤其没有道理。今天，与这些情绪相反，我要解释为什么女性应当反对军国主义……反军国主义能帮助平民夺取自己的自由；它能将保护延伸至所有人类生命。”[44] 雷燕把艺术当作反复进行的反思与关怀仪式，以” 如果” 和” 我如何” 的追问提出，与中国当代艺术作为全球抵达标志的前提形成对照。

Over a decade after Li Tianpian's death, one of her shuang nü ti (double female figure) studies in oil reappeared in the public eye, repurposed in a painting by a male contemporary. Wang Xingwei, like Li Tianpian, hails from Shenyang and originally trained in socialist realism. In 2013, the Ullens Center for Contemporary Art (ucca) in Beijing's 798 Art District held a midcareer retrospective of Wang's work, seventy-four paintings spanning two decades. Executed in a wide range of styles, the paintings juxtapose in weird, witty, and reiterative ways references drawn from European classical, Chinese socialist, and "global" contemporary art canons. They mix, in a seemingly indiscriminate manner, figures and poses from the likes of Sandro Botticelli, Jean Auguste Dominique Ingres, Marcel Duchamp, Joseph Beuys, Li Chunhua, Quan Shanshi, Allen Jones, Jeff Koons, Fang Lijun, and Wang Guangyi, as well commercial imagery and cartoons from reform-era Chinese newspapers, magazines, and public blackboards.[1]

李天翩去世十多年后，她的一幅" 双女体" 油画习作重新出现在公众视野中，被一位男性同代艺术家挪用进自己的画作。与李天翩一样，王兴伟也来自沈阳，最初受的是社会主义现实主义训练。2013 年，北京 798 艺术区的尤伦斯当代艺术中心（UCCA）举办了王兴伟的艺术生涯中期回顾展，展出横跨二十年的七十四幅油画。这些画作以多种风格绘成，以怪异、机智而反复的方式并置取自欧洲古典、中国社会主义和" 全球" 当代艺术经典的参照。它们看似不加区分地混合了桑德罗・波提切利、让-奥古斯特-多米尼克・安格尔、马塞尔・杜尚、约瑟夫・博伊斯、Li Chunhua、全山石、艾伦・琼斯、杰夫・昆斯、方力钧和王广义等人的人物与姿态，以及改革时代中国报纸、杂志和公共黑板上的商业图像与漫画。[1]

A 2002 painting was hung as the final piece in the ucca exhibit.[2] Untitled (Three Nudes) copies and composes together figurative works by Yang Feiyun and Li Tianpian. Yang's Male Nude, painted in 1981 while he was a student at the Central Academy of Fine Arts, features a model in a powerful upright stance. His raises one fist to his chest; the other, clenched around a stone, extends down and to his side. The spotlit pose, accentuated by a dark background, shows off muscular definition and realist anatomical representation. In Wang's restaging, Yang's male nude stands at the rear of the pictorial space, behind the two female figures from Li Tianpian's Women of the Republic of China.[3] In her original, painted in 1998 while she was a student at the China Art Academy, two nudes rest side by side on a chaise lounge draped with a white sheet: one sits facing the back wall, her head bent down as if looking at something in her hands; the other faces forward and reclines to the side, in an odalisquelike pose. Untitled (Three Nudes) stages the figures from these staid academic studies in a triangulated charade of sexual service and visual consumption. The woman with her back to the viewer buries her face in the genitalia of the male nude who towers above her. His gaze, in turn, falls directly upon the exposed body of the second woman. She stares blankly out, as if oblivious to the scene into which she's been conscripted. The ucca exhibit wall text for the painting notes, "Wang cheekily combines two classics of Chinese academic realism." The painting, hung at the end of his retrospective, might be read as a parting shot at the academic art of copying, his critique of and creative rise above it, even as his globally recognized oeuvre of formal repetition and juxtaposition depends on the skills and references of this training.

一幅 2002 年的画作被挂在尤伦斯展览的最后。[2] 《无题（三个裸体）》复制并组合了杨飞云与李天翩的具象作品。杨飞云的《男人体》作于 1981 年他在中央美术学院读书时，画中模特以强有力的直立姿态出现。模特的一只拳头举到胸前，另一只紧握石头，向下伸向身侧。聚光灯下的姿态被深色背景衬托，展示出肌肉的轮廓与写实的解剖表现。在王兴伟的重置中，杨飞云的男性裸体站在画面空间后方，位于李天翩《民国女性》中两个女性形象之后。[3] 在原作中——她 1998 年在中国美术学院读书时所作——两个裸体并排歇在一张铺着白床单的贵妃榻上：一人坐着面向后墙，低头仿佛在看手中的东西；另一人面向前方，侧身斜倚，姿态如后宫侍女。《无题（三个裸体）》把这些古板学院习作中的人物搬演成一场三角形的哑剧，涉及性服务与视觉消费。背对观者的女人把脸埋进高耸于她之上的男性裸体的生殖器。他的目光则直直落在第二个女人裸露的身体上。她茫然地向外凝视，仿佛浑然不觉自己已被征召进这场戏。尤伦斯展览为这幅画写的展墙说明指出："王兴伟俏皮地结合了两件中国学院写实主义的经典之作。"这幅画挂在他回顾展的末尾，或可读作对学院临摹艺术的一记临别之击，是他对它的批判与创造性的超越，尽管他那些以形式重复与并置而获全球承认的作品，恰恰依赖这种训练所赋予的技能与参照。

When I first saw the painting, none of this critical apparatus mattered. It simply felt like an affront. What did it mean for Li Tianpian to be returned to the world in this way? Detached from her now (almost) disappeared body of work—her struggles with the medium of painting, its politics of representation, and gendered norms of work and duty—she is cast without recourse in the role-playing games of another. This recruitment as readymade, a well-worn conceptual move, ignores the fact that at the same moment she painted Women of the Republic of China, whose title harkens to the early twentieth-century introduction of nude model painting from Europe to China, she also painted Red Souvenir. Her own experimentation with montage, its layers of gendered representation and repression, slides out of history.

> I just wanted to put these artistic representations side by side, and then add historical reality to the picture. To put them all together like this... Think about it, these original women when they started out were so beautiful, wearing military uniforms, with straps and supply bags criss-crossing their chests, wearing these kinds of clothes, some in dresses. They have such a valiant and heroic bearing. Then after they were captured... this picture was taken when they were in jail... they're wearing old clothes. It wasn't long after their release that they married the enemy.

> 我只想把这些艺术再现并置，然后给画面加入历史现实。就这样把它们全部放在一起……想想看，历史上这些真实的女性刚开始时多么美丽，穿着军装，带子和补给袋交叉绑在胸前，穿着这样的衣服，有些人穿裙子。她们有那样英勇豪迈的姿态。后来她们被捕……这张照片是她们在狱中拍的……她们穿着旧衣服。获释没多久，她们就嫁给了敌人。

Wang Xingwei, in his incessant return to and collision of iconic images and poses, seems intent on exposing their ideological underpinnings, the systems of social, cultural, and political meaning that grant them value.[4] His aesthetics of montage—like many of the artworks and modes of practice I have focused on in this book—show Chinese contemporary art to be a zone of cultural encounter. His paintings emerge from and contend with shifting conditions for cultural production in China. While worldings overlap with or haunt one another in his work, they remain centrally structured, perhaps even critically so, by patriarchal gender norms. But to the extent that Untitled (Three Nudes) makes Li Tianpian the butt of a joke—that of the self-fellating masterpiece—it robs her of the power to world.[5] Its irreverent surface conceals the material sociality of her position in an emergent art world. Its front affronts the laboring bodies of the models, the memory of Li Tianpian, and the embodied, resistant histories of those disciplined by visual regimes of typification.[6] If Wang Xingwei, the eponymous retrospective exhibit at ucca, an eponymous museum founded by a Belgian businessman who over three decades amassed one of the largest collections of Chinese contemporary art, represents a kind of monumentality, its final work remains haunted by what it makes ephemeral.

王兴伟不断回返并碰撞各种标志性图像与姿态，似乎执意要揭露它们的意识形态根基，那些赋予它们价值的社会、文化与政治意义系统。[4] 他的蒙太奇美学——像本书聚焦的许多艺术作品与实践方式一样——表明中国当代艺术是一个文化相遇地带。他的画作从中国不断变化的文化生产条件中产生，并与之角力。在他的作品中，各种世界营造相互重叠或彼此萦绕，但在核心处仍由父权制性别规范所结构，甚至可能是批判性地结构。然而，就《无题（三个裸体）》把李天翩变成笑柄——那个自我口交的杰作——而言，它剥夺了她营造世界的力量。[5] 它不敬的表面掩盖了她在新兴艺术世界中位置的物质社会性。它的画面正面冒犯了模特劳动的身体、李天翩的记忆，以及那些被典型化的视觉体制所规训者具身的、抵抗的历史。[6] 如果尤伦斯当代艺术中心举办的同名回顾展《王兴伟》代表某种纪念碑性——这座以创办者命名的美术馆由一位比利时商人创办，他三十多年间积聚起全球最大的中国当代艺术收藏之一——那么它最后一件作品仍被它所化为短暂之物的东西所萦绕。

Throughout the many years of researching and writing this book, I have sought to situate Chinese contemporary art in an expanded field that takes into account gender and globalization articulated together. Doing so has required laying out and puzzling through the interlocking double binds that catch art world social actors up. It has meant cultivating a dialectical understanding of monumental and ephemeral across time, seeing one as the shadow of the other in a historical field of ruin, erasure, and excavation. When certain forms of representation and life take on weight, solidity, and authority, a particular worlding comes to seem self-evident. Yet the creative striving and critical labor of those never quite concealed by this process continually disrupt its smooth surface, even or especially when the worlding enlists them—their bodies and their imaginations—at their own expense. From my position in the U.S. academy, where self-evident worldings are challenged but also often reproduced, I understand my creative, critical labor to be that of recognizing, unforgetting, and making visible these disruptions.

在研究和写作本书的许多年里，我一直试图把中国当代艺术置于一个扩展场域中，同时考虑性别与全球化的相互勾连。这样做要求铺陈并苦思那些捕获艺术世界社会行动者的相互扣连的双重束缚。它意味着培养一种跨越时间的、关于纪念碑式与短暂性的辩证理解，在废墟、抹除与挖掘的历史场域中把一方视为另一方的影子。当某些再现形式与生活形式获得重量、坚实性与权威时，一种特定的世界营造便显得不言自明。然而，那些从未被这一过程完全遮蔽者的创造性努力与批判性劳动，不断扰乱它光滑的表面；甚至尤其当这种世界营造以他们自身为代价征用他们——他们的身体与想象——时，情况更是如此。从我在美国学界的立场来看——在那里，不言自明的世界营造受到挑战，但也常常被再生产——我把自己的创造性、批判性劳动理解为辨认、拒绝遗忘并让这些扰乱变得可见。

Approaching the art world as a feminist anthropologist shaped my knowledge, such that I cannot see a painting like Wang Xingwei's Untitled (Three Nudes) without placing it within an expanded image world that also includes a Red Detachment retrospective of Li Tianpian as presented in chapter 5. If I had conducted my research primarily through attention to Chinese contemporary art exhibits, events, and discourse, this feminist sight line would have been occluded. The time I spent as a participant observer attuned to questions of gender and power in classrooms, in encounters between Chinese and Western artists and curators, and in interviews and activities with a broad range of people engaged in the pursuit of something they called art informs my interpretation of the images produced in the process. If not an ethnographer, I most likely would never have met Li Tianpian or spent the time to see the world from her perspective, as I did through fragments of conversation on the mattress on the floor, our backs to the wall, of the small room in which she lived as unmarried teacher of oil painting in the socialist realist tradition.

以女性主义人类学家的方式接近艺术世界，塑造了我的知识；以至于我看到王兴伟《无题（三个裸体）》这样的画时，无法不把它置入一个扩展的图像世界，其中也包括第五章所描述的对李天翩的" 红色娘子军" 式重新审视。如果我主要通过关注中国当代艺术展览、事件与话语来开展研究，这条女性主义视线就会被遮蔽。我作为参与观察者，在教室里、在中国与西方艺术家和策展人的相遇中、在与广泛人群的访谈与活动中，始终关注性别与权力问题；这些人所追求的某种东西，他们称之为艺术。这段经历塑造了我对过程中产生的图像的解读。如果我不是民族志学者，我极可能永远不会遇见李天翩，也不会花时间从她的视角看世界；我是在她作为社会主义现实主义传统中未婚油画教师的狭小房间里，坐在铺在地板上的床垫上、背靠着墙，通过一段段零碎的交谈做到这一点的。

Since the now historical turn-of-the-millennium moment of my initial fieldwork, contemporary art from China has achieved global recognition in museums, galleries, and auction houses throughout Europe, North America, Asia, and beyond. High-profile Chinese artists have made individual names for themselves on this circuit, as solo shows for some abate, to an extent, the sense of being the face of the other in Western exhibitions of "global art." New cultural institutions within the Chinese Mainland showcase, collect, and sell this work almost as a matter of course. Artists in border locations like Hong Kong, Taiwan, Korea, and Vietnam, as well as Chinese diasporic artists in other parts of the world, increasingly feel the hegemony of Mainland China's place in an international art world order. Official leadership still periodically exercises a heavy hand with regard to artistic expression, as evidenced by high-profile events like the arrest of Ai Weiwei in 2011 or closure of the Beijing Independent Film Festival in 2014. In that same year, President Xi Jinping gave an internal speech on the arts as part of his overall consolidation of power and control of dissent. The full text was publicly released one year later. Modeled after Mao's "Talks at the Yan'an Conference on Art and Literature," Xi tasked artists and writers with upholding morality, progress, and the "Chinese spirit," lambasting those who produce "cultural garbage" that does not distinguish between good and evil or conform to party discipline.[7] Nonetheless, the culture industry that arose in conjunction with China's twenty-first millennial push to go global as an economic and political force to be reckoned with remains alive and well. Culture and creativity have, indeed, become new modes of governmentality, ways of cultivating and celebrating individual aspiration, talent, and authorship even as these discursive constructions control, through stratification along class, ethnic, and gender lines, those who may or may not receive recognition and material rewards.[8] My ethnography, of a turning point in Chinese contemporary art, provides an account of the history that underlies this contemporary situation.

自最初田野调查那个如今已成历史的千禧年之交时刻以来，中国当代艺术已在欧洲、北美、亚洲及其他地区的博物馆、画廊和拍卖行获得全球承认。高知名度的中国艺术家在这个圈子中打出了个人名声，对其中一些人而言，个展在一定程度上减轻了在西方" 全球艺术" 展览中沦为" 他者面孔" 的感觉。中国大陆的新文化机构几乎理所当然地展示、收藏并销售这些作品。香港、台湾、韩国和越南等边境地带的艺术家，以及世界其他地方的华人离散艺术家，日益感受到中国大陆在国际艺术世界秩序中之位置的霸权。官方领导层仍间或对艺术表达施加铁腕，2011 年艾未未被捕或 2014 年北京独立影像展被关闭等高曝光事件即为明证。同年，习近平主席发表了一篇关于文艺的内部讲话，这是他全面巩固权力、控制异见的组成部分。讲话全文在一年后公开发表。这篇讲话仿照毛泽东《在延安文艺座谈会上的讲话》，要求艺术家和作家维护道德、进步与" 中国精神"，猛烈抨击那些生产不分善恶、不服从党的纪律的" 文化垃圾" 的人。[7] 尽管如此，伴随中国 21 世纪作为不可忽视的经济与政治力量走向全球的推动而兴起的文化产业，依然生机勃勃。文化与创造力确实已成为新的治理术模式，成为培养并颂扬个人抱负、才华与作者性的方式；与此同时，这些话语构形又通过阶级、族群与性别界限的分层，控制着谁可能或不可能获得承认与物质回报。[8] 我这部关于中国当代艺术转折点的民族志，为理解当前处境背后的历史提供了一份叙述。

In the introduction, I reflected on a question I wrote in a 2002 field note: Am I trying to write an ethnography about a city in which art plays a part or an ethnography about art in which the city plays a part? My research explored the questions that unfolded from that one. How do aesthetics do more than simply reflect political, social, and economic change? How does cultural production actively shape collective consciousness and social identity, perceptions of time and space, and visions of the world? What is the legacy of past forms of visual praxis on contemporary production? How are envisioned timespaces always-already uneven and gendered? While the rise and recognition of Chinese contemporary art may now seem a fait accompli, the questions and struggles explored in these pages persist. A closely observed story of the past, related through the experiences, words, and images of the social actors involved in its making, provides a challenge to future master scripts of it. As the artists I worked with taught me again and again, the past is an open resource. As I write this epilogue in 2016, a new opera The Long March plays at Beijing's National Centre for the Performing Arts to celebrate, with full nationalistic fervor, the historical event's eightieth anniversary. The words of the opening chorus—"We differ in status, but we have the same aspiration: to join the Red Army. To change the world!"—reverberate through a theater designed by Paul Andreu as part of the effort to remake the capital city and launch it anew on the global stage.[9] Spectacular productions like this one are meant to smooth over the ironies and contradictions of the differing politics and systems of art it enfolds together. The motley "what if" struggles of participants who, as recounted in chapter 4, gathered on the shores of Lugu Lake in 2001 for an earlier restaging of The Long March, serve as a discomfiting counterpoint to this choral expression of national unity. They likewise unsettle ideas about global art and global feminism raised by exhibits and projects organized under these banners.

在引言中，我反思了 2002 年一条田野笔记中写下的问题：我是在写一部艺术在其中扮演角色的城市的民族志，还是在写一部城市在其中扮演角色的艺术的民族志？我的研究探索了由这个问题展开的一系列问题。美学如何不只是反映政治、社会与经济变迁？文化生产又如何积极塑造集体意识与社会认同、对时间与空间的感知，以及对世界的想象？过去的视觉实践形式对当代生产留下什么遗产？被构想出来的时空如何总是已经不均等且性别化的？尽管中国当代艺术的崛起与获得承认如今也许看似既成事实，本书探讨的问题与斗争仍然持续。一个通过参与其建构的社会行动者的经验、言语与图像讲述的、细致观察的过去故事，为未来关于它的主导叙事脚本提供了挑战。与我共事的艺术家们一再教导我，过去是一种开放的资源。我在 2016 年撰写这篇尾声时，一部新

歌剧《长征》正在北京国家大剧院上演，以十足的民族主义热情庆祝这一历史事件八十周年。开场合唱的歌词——" 我们地位不同，但志向相同：参加红军。改变世界！"——回荡在保罗・安德鲁设计的剧院中；这座剧院是重塑首都、使其以新面貌登上全球舞台的努力的一部分。[9] 像这样的奇观式演出，意在抹平它所并置的不同艺术政治与艺术体系之间的反讽与矛盾。如第四章所述，2001 年一群参与者聚集在泸沽湖畔，为" 长征" 做更早一次重演，他们形形色色、以" 如果" 为题的挣扎，构成对这种合唱式民族统一表达的令人不安的对照。它们同样扰乱了在这些旗帜下组织的展览与项目所提出的关于全球艺术与全球女性主义的观念。

In the prologue, "Worldly Fables," I sketched the lives of two early twentieth-century artists as a way of refuting the myth of China's millennial "linking tracks with the world" as brand new. I paired Xu Beihong and Pan Yuliang because of their historical proximity and the ways their paths crossed each other in European and Chinese art institutions. Their adaptation of academic oil painting to different representational ends fed into a heated debate about the social role of art in the Chinese cultural politics of their time. I also paired them to demonstrate that at every turn of their careers gender politics influenced what they painted, the opportunities that opened or closed to them, and their artistic afterlives. When this prefatory conceit, of twinned male and female artists, continued to reappear in my own developing narrative, my initial instinct was to tamp it down. Why, I thought, in writing about Lei Yan did I need to bring Ai Weiwei into the picture, even if I could make him the shadow story to her life and work instead of the other way around? Did the surfacing of Wang Xingwei's Untitled (Three Nudes) in the wake of Li Tianpian's death make it worth writing about it? Why couldn't I simply write about artists like Pan Yuliang, Lei Yan, and Li Tianpian without reference to male peers whose visibility has often eclipsed theirs? Wouldn't inverting the usual rules of the game serve some notion of justice? Then it dawned on me that these troublesome pairings, which seemed to arise from my research materials against my internal critic's will, demonstrated with utter clarity and specificity the conceptual mechanism of nannü youbie (male/female differentiation) as first theorized by He-Yin Zhen prior to the historical emergence of Pan Yuliang and Xu Beihong. The work of art actively produces social distinctions as a form of power and domination. It reiterates symbolic orders, sometimes with a radical difference, always within a relationship of past to present.

在序言" 世俗寓言" 中，我勾勒了两位 20 世纪初艺术家的生平，以此反驳中国千禧年" 与世界接轨" 是全新事物的神话。我把徐悲鸿与潘玉良配对，是因为他们历史时间的接近，以及他们的道路在欧洲与中国的艺术建制中交错的方式。他们把学院油画改编为不同的表征目的，投入当时中国文化政治中关于艺术社会角色的激烈争论。我把他们配对，也是为了表明，在他们生涯的每一个转折处，性别政治都影响着他们画什么、哪些机会向他们敞开或关闭，以及他们的艺术身后事。当这个由一男一女两位艺术家组成的开篇构想在我逐渐展开的叙述中不断重现时，我最初的本能是把它压下去。我想，为什么在写雷燕时，我需要把艾未未带进画面，即使我可以让他成为她生活与作品的影子故事，而不是反过来？王兴伟的《无题（三个裸体）》在李天翩去世后出现，是否值得写它？为什么我不能只写潘玉良、雷燕和李天翩这样的艺术家，而不提那些可见度常常遮蔽她们的男性同侪？颠倒通常的游戏规则，难道不服务于某种正义观念吗？然后我恍然大悟：这些麻烦的配对似乎违背我内心批评者的意愿，从研究材料中浮现出来，却以极其清晰而具体的方式展示了男女有别（nannü youbie）的概念机制；这个概念最早由何殷震在潘玉良与徐悲鸿历史性地出现之前提出。艺术工作积极生产社会区分，将其作为一种权力与支配的形式。它重述象征秩序，有时带着激进的差异，却始终处于过去与现在的关系之中。

In this book, guided by the artists who have opened my feminist sight lines, I emphasize the possibility of radical difference, of differential historiographical consciousness, of imagining a world that is not hierarchically structured by these social abstractions and markings. As much as nannü hierarchies persist in the pairings I present, the artistic practice of the women I focus on confront them in deep and complex ways that open up interpretation of work by male peers and the work of art enmeshed in global power relations. Feminist art as a relational epistemology thus moves beyond recognition of the "woman artist" to the act of making visible multidirectional tensions between colonial and decolonial forces in struggles over what counts as art. Finally, the artists I bring to the fore also demonstrate that feminist movement in China, even though its Sinophonic articulations are less than fully translated by this catchall in English, are as far from brand new as China is to the world.

在本书中，在那些为我打开女性主义视线的艺术家引导下，我强调激进差异的可能性，强调差异化的史学意识，强调想象一个不被这些社会抽象与标记按等级结构出来的世界。尽管男女等级在我呈现的配对中持续存在，我所聚焦的女性艺术实践以深刻而复杂的方式直面它们，从而开启了对男性同侪作品以及深陷全球权力关系的艺术工作的解读。因此，作为关系认识论的女性主义艺术超越了承认" 女性艺术家"，转向让殖民与去殖民力量之间在" 何为艺术" 之争中的多向张力变得可见。最后，我所凸显的艺术家也表明，中国的女性主义运动——尽管其在华语中的表述无法被这个英语统称完全译出——绝非崭新之物；中国对世界而言也同样并非新来者。

The first images of this book, Wang Nengtao's Subversion, Yin Xiuzhen's Portable Beijing, and Chen Lingyang's 25:00, laid the ground for my argument about Chinese contemporary art as a zone of cultural encounter. They respond aesthetically to the chaiqian (demolition and relocation) turning over of China's capital, in which art and urbanism intertwine in the global city under construction, and in which gender and sexuality figure centrally in iterative conceptions of China's modernity and worldliness. In 2006, multimedia artist Cao Fei began creating an online interactive environment in Second Life (sl) that figuratively collides the worldings imaged by the artworks I chose as my entry point.[10] She describes this three-dimensional virtual world—named rmb City after the reminbi, or "people's currency," of the prc—as an expression of the forces that "made China, my country, such a syncretic experimental place."[11] The sl-user "residents" who populate the city interact through customized avatars and instant messaging. Designed by Cao in collaboration with Guangzhou's Vitamin Creative Space and overseas sl builders, rmb City theatricalizes in a speculative, open-ended way the development of the Chinese global city as an uneven and gendered timespace.

本书开篇的图像——王能涛的《颠覆》、尹秀珍的《便携北京》和陈羚羊的《25:00》——为我关于中国当代艺术是文化相遇地带的论点奠定了基础。它们以美学方式回应中国首都拆迁翻建的进程；在这一进程中，艺术与城市主义在建设中的全球城市里相互交织，性别与性则在中国现代性与世界性的反复构想中占据核心位置。2006 年，多媒体艺术家曹斐开始在" 第二人生"（Second Life，SL）中创造一个在线互动环境，以比喻方式碰撞我选作切入点的那些作品所想象的世界营造。[10] 她把这个名为《人民城寨》（RMB City，取自中华人民共和国的" 人民币"）的三维虚拟世界，描述为一种力量的表达，这些力量" 使中国——我的国家——成为如此兼容并蓄的实验场所"。[11] 填充这座城市的" 第二人生" 用户" 居民"，通过定制的化身和即时通讯互动。《人民城寨》由曹斐与广州维他命空间及海外" 第二人生" 建造者合作设计，以思辨、开放的方式戏剧化中国全球城市的发展，将其呈现为一个不均等且性别化的时空。

The virtual world of rmb City consists of an island cut in the cartographic shape of modern China, which emerges from the middle of the ocean. Balanced atop the island is an elaborate structure of disparate architectural elements assembled together to create a three-dimensional fantasy park that sl users explore via their avatars. At one edge of the island city, a statue of the Great Helmsman sinks into the ocean, his hand raised toward the rusted out remains of the Olympic Bird's Nest stadium. Karl Marx floats on an embroidered cushion over a winding highway between I. M. Pei's Hong Kong Bank of China Tower and a giant golden Buddha. The bubbly pink and silver spaceship-like Oriental Pearl Tower from Shanghai rises in the center at a precarious tilt. Rem Koolhaas's cctv Tower dangles upside down, suspended over the city, from a monstrous crane. Four ancient stone pillars—one balanced on an armed tank, another on a warship—rise into the sky to support the Gate of Heavenly Peace. A waterpark, instead of Tiananmen Square, extends in front of it. A portrait of a panda hangs on the gate, between two large slogans in white and red. Instead of "Long Live the People's Republic of China" and "Long Live the Great Unity of the World's Peoples," they declare in English "My City Is Yours" and "Your City Is Mine." This updated billing was provided by a gallery in New York's Chelsea district, which provided the artist with real-life (rl) retail space for an "advanced preview and sale" of the planned city. In a dramatic mimicry of the conjunction of real estate, urban planning, and art explored through chapter 2, investors and institutions used rl cash to rent virtual buildings and commission virtual projects in rmb City.[12]

《人民城寨》的虚拟世界由一个按照现代中国版图形状切割的岛屿构成，岛屿从海洋中央升起。岛屿顶端平衡着一座精巧结构，由互不相干的建筑元素拼装而成，形成一座三维奇幻公园，" 第二人生" 用户通过化身在其中探索。在岛屿城市的一侧，伟大舵手的雕像沉入海洋，他举起的手指向锈蚀残破的奥运鸟巢体育场遗迹。卡尔・马克思坐在一只绣花坐垫上，漂浮在蜿蜒公路之上；公路位于贝聿铭的香港中银大厦与一尊巨大金佛之间。来自上海、粉银相间、泡泡般圆润、形似飞船的东方明珠塔在中央以一种危险的倾斜角度升起。雷姆・库哈斯的央视大楼倒悬在城市上方，由一台巨型起重机吊着。四根古代石柱升向天空，支撑着天安门；其中一根稳立于一辆武装坦克上，另一根立于一艘军舰上。它前方延伸开的不是天安门广场，而是一座水上乐园。门楼上挂着一幅熊猫画像，两侧是红白两色的大标语。标语并非" 中华人民共和国万岁" 和" 世界人民大团结万岁"，而是用英文写着" 我的城市属于你" 和" 你的城市属于我"。这一更新版的标语来自纽约切尔西区的一家画廊；该画廊为艺术家提供了现实生活（RL）中的零售空间，用于这座规划城市的" 提前预览与销售"。这是对第二章所探讨的房地产、城市规划与艺术结合的戏剧性模仿：投资者与机构用现实货币在《人民城寨》中租赁虚拟建筑、委托虚拟项目。[12]

Cao Fei inhabits rmb City as the avatar China Tracy, whose sexy cyberpunk warrior fashion shows off the exaggerated proportions of the typical female body in gamer culture. She wanders the city, walking through and flying over it, and interacts with other users' avatars. The piece has been exhibited around the world, primarily in video form but also in a yangbanxi (model opera) adaptation that combined actors and video projection.[13] For the 2007 Venice Biennale, Cao staged an onsite and sl China Tracy Pavilion, which screened a three-part cyber epic based on six months of China Tracy's journeys through a city for sale, including her love affair with a young male avatar, Hug Yue, whom she later discovered was a sixty-five-year-old American. Produced as machinima, the technique of filming a virtual environment using video game software, i-Mirror: A Second Life Documentary Film opens with a black screen and the sound of typing on a computer keyboard. The following lines appear in glowing yellow font: "I construct, and I am constructed, in a mutually recursive process that continually changes my fluid, permeable boundaries and my endlessly ramifying networks. I am a spatially extended cyborg."[14]

曹斐以化身" 中国 • 翠西"（China Tracy）栖居于《人民城寨》；她性感的赛博朋克女战士时尚，展现出游戏文化中典型女性身体被夸张的比例。她在城中漫游，步行穿过它，也从它上方飞过，并与其他用户的化身互动。这件作品在世界各地展出，主要以影像形式，也有一种结合演员与影像投影的样板戏改编版本。[13] 2007 年威尼斯双年展，曹斐搭建了一个现场与" 第二人生" 并置的" 中国 • 翠西馆"，放映一部三部分赛博史诗，取材于中国 • 翠西在六个月里穿越一座待售之城的旅程，包括她与年轻男性化身 Hug Yue 的恋情——她后来发现对方是一名 65 岁的美国人。《i • 镜：一部第二人生纪录片》以游戏引擎电影（machinima）手法制作——即用电子游戏软件拍摄虚拟环境的技术——开场是黑屏和敲击电脑键盘的声音。随后，发亮的黄色字体出现以下句子：" 我建构，也被建构，在一个相互递归的过程中，这个过程不断改变我流动、可渗透的边界与我无尽分岔的网络。我是一个空间上延展的赛博格。"[14]

In 2009 Cao created the machinima Live in rmb City, commissioned by Tokyo's Shiseido gallery for a solo show of her work. As reflection on life after the birth of her son, the film features China Tracy leading a toddler avatar, China Sun, through their virtual world while answering his stream of questions about its buildings, inhabitants, and the meaning of their existence. The mother frankly, if sometimes elliptically, tutors her curious son—not so subtly named after the "East is Red" national metaphor of the ccp as the shining sun—in the political, creative, and sexual economies of their world. Conspicuously absent is a father figure, suggesting an alternative to national traditions of patriarchal hegemony in the real and representational realms. When Cao returns to the real world and China Tracy disappears, China Sun has to endure the loneliness of life without her, a mirroring of the artist's navigation of divisions between real and virtual, artistic and affective, productive and reproductive labor. Their mother-child dialogue ends with a set of questions from China Sun about his parentage: "Father? Who is father? What does he look like? Like Godzilla? Or Ultraman? Or Doraemon.... Mother, how do I get to the real world? When you have time, can you bring me along with you? Is there a rmb City like this one too?"[15] Cao Fei eventually brought an end to rmb City by sinking it into the ocean. The project made its final appearance in Apocalypse Tomorrow: Surf in rmb City, a 2011 one-person-game art installation that lets players surf, using a monk avatar, through the flooded ruins. In a screen shot of Live in rmb City (plate 19) that circulates as one of its afterimages, China Tracy rises above her virtual world. She looms large in the foreground with the darkened backdrop of the city behind her shrouded in smoke. Faint lights illuminate the contours of its miniaturized monuments. Her voluptuous body is encased in a suit of shiny silver metal. Her right arm, a large mechanical, armed claw, wraps protectively around China Sun. They both look past the viewer toward another horizon.

2009 年，曹斐受东京资生堂画廊委托，为她个展创作游戏引擎电影《生活在人民城寨》。这部影片是对她儿子出生后生活的反思，片中中国 • 翠西带着幼儿化身” 中国 • 太阳”（China Sun）穿过他们的虚拟世界，同时回答他关于城中建筑、居民及其存在意义的一连串问题。这位母亲坦率——尽管有时隐晦——地给好奇的儿子讲解他们世界中的政治、创造与性经济；儿子的名字相当直白地取自中共” 东方红” 的国族隐喻，把党比作照亮万物的太阳。父亲形象明显缺席，暗示着在现实与表征领域中替代民族传统父权霸权的可能。当曹斐回到现实世界、中国 • 翠西消失后，中国 • 太阳不得不忍受没有她的孤独生活；这映照着艺术家在真实与虚拟、艺术与情感、生产性劳动与再生产性劳动之间的区隔中穿行。他们的母子对话以中国 • 太阳关于自己出身的一连串问题结束：” 爸爸？爸爸是谁？他长什么样？像哥斯拉？还是奥特曼？还是哆啦 A 梦……妈妈，我怎么才能到真实世界去？你有空的时候，能带我一起去吗？那里也有一座这样的《人民城寨》吗？”[15] 曹斐最终让《人民城寨》沉入海洋，结束了它。这个项目最后出现在《明日启示录：在人民城寨冲浪》中——一件 2011 年的单人游戏艺术装置，玩家使用僧人化身在被淹没的废墟间冲浪。在作为其余像之一流传的《生活在人民城寨》截屏（图版 19）中，中国 • 翠西升到她的虚拟世界之上。她在前景中赫然耸立，身后城市昏暗的背景笼罩在烟雾中。微弱的灯光照亮城中微缩纪念碑的轮廓。她丰腴的身体裹在一套闪亮的银色金属服装里。她的右臂——一只巨大的机械武装利爪——保护性地环抱着中国 • 太阳。两人都越过观者，望向另一道地平线。

Born a generation after most of the artists whose lives and works fill this book, Cao Fei, a.k.a. China Tracy, continues, as she moves through the monumental ruins of the past and present toward a speculative future, to explore the “ramifying networks” of image worlds that unfold over space and time. I imagine flashing across the illuminated billboards of rmb City a palimpsest of other images bearing an aesthetic relationship with China Tracy’s appearance on the horizon: a woman with binoculars to her eyes gazing out toward a flying machine, or back toward soldiers on the battlefield of history; the visage of actress Ruan Lingyu superimposed over the glittering lights of colonial-era Shanghai in her 1934 silent film role as a hard-working prostitute driven to desperation, or projected in a scale-model animation for a cinema at the center of the Grand moma apartment complex in new millennium Beijing; a maidservant who exposes her wounds as a gesture of protest, or a woman in a purple wig and sunglasses who wields a cleaver in the sprawling scale model for Beijing’s SOHO real estate development; a bare-breasted woman atop a watch tower on the Great Wall likened to Liberty Leading the People or transformed into a blur of light and motion; a giantess who becomes as large as she likes and does whatever she likes at the magic hour of 25:00.

译校说明与术语

译校说明（编者附录）

本稿依据 Sasha Su-Ling Welland 的 Experimental Beijing: Gender and Globalization in Chinese Contemporary Art（Duke University Press，2018）制作。译校以所附底本为准。原书印刷页码与 PDF 文件页序分别记录；阅读稿重新分页后，文中指向原书的页码仍指底本，不指新稿页码。

文中的访谈、文学引文、演出对白与新闻引文，原则上由本书所载英文译成中文。除逐项校注明确注明已与中文原件核合者外，不应把这里的中文引号内容当成历史中文原句或访谈录音的逐字转录。即使引文涉及中文作品，作者的英文选译、节录、转述及译者的中文回译仍须区分；原注保留检索线索。文字来源的这一限制不影响作者对访谈或引文的署名归属。

艺术作品、展览及出版物的中文题名，未能由原件或可靠机构记录确认者，应视为便于阅读的译名。双语稿保留对应英文题名；参考文献保留原文著录。拼音人名不能仅凭读音反推汉字；存在疑问时须保留原拼音或在专名表说明证据层级。

对原书自身的年代、地名、拼写或引文疑点，不以无声改写替代作者文本。已确定的抽取断词、串行和图像解码错误在数据中留有修复记录；需要讨论的原作疑点单列校注。书目和索引中底本实际印出的异常也与抽取错误区分。

图像沿用底本，包括原作的黑白 / 彩色状态和组合关系。彩色图版的原始 JPEG 数据在直接查看时会发生反色；交付稿使用按照 PDF 色彩参数解码的 PNG，原始抽取文件保留作来源证据。图中的旧行政区划及原文标签保留，不能误认作当今地图。

本稿的校对证据区分逐段语义比较、来源覆盖、外部事实核验、版面检查及线上发布核验。语义校对与结构覆盖不等于对全部引用文献和历史陈述进行了独立查证。

已确认的底本文字差异

第七章原注 43 将 Graham Harman 的书名写为 Tool-Being，而原书参考文献印刷页 310 印为 Tool-Beijing: Heidegger and the Metaphysics of Objects。本稿保留两处底本写法，便于对照；这不是抽取过程引入的差异。

导论印刷页 23 引述 Danto 的句子出现 decry，中文按该论述语境译为 “ 辨识 ”。关于它与 descry 的差别，正文校注保留疑点；本次没有取得足以认定原刊印刷文字及勘误的证据，不能把这一处理称为已证实的作者笔误。

专名和原作陈述的处理

Wu Weihe、Bai Chongmin、Shan Lianxiao、摄影者 Yan Yan 与 Han Lei 的汉字身份，本次没有完成针对具体人物的一手来源确认，因此统一保留书中罗马字写法。这不意味着此前汉字写法必然错误。作品题名与引文未另注核验者，仍适用前述译名和回译原则。

正文及原注中的年代差异、回忆性表述、旧行政区划和历史判断按作者文本保留。校对不以未经证实的推测改写这些陈述，读者应结合原注所列材料研究。本稿未声称对所有历史事实、采访身份或引用资料作独立查证。
